W. A. R., Richmond College, Va.—Authors do not use shorthand a great deal in their work, but very many of them wish they knew it well enough to do so. We would not advise you to study stenography as thoroughly as though you intended to follow it as a profession, but you will never regret acquiring it sufficiently to use it when needed and it will very often come in most handy when least expected. Besides it is fine mental training, not to mention its virtues as a language study.

Mrs. C. H., Clearfield, Pa.—We think you are right in wanting to raise your children on a farm and though you may be poor, if you will teach your children how to farm properly they will be independent, which is better than being rich. But if you let them plug along in the old-fashioned farming methods they will be poorer than you are. Read farm papers, get new ideas and when you have got them don't be afraid to work them to a finish; study not only how best to raise stuff to sell, but what stuff will sell best and learn how to market it at a profit. Send one, at least, of your children to an agricultural school where new things are taught and let him teach all the rest of the family. We know one farmer who makes money on twenty-five acres and two brothers who are positively getting rich on one hundred and fifty acres, but they are not old-fashioned farmers sticking to the plow from sun-up to sun-down. They have learned modern methods and are following them to success. Ask any of your local bankers about the Rural Credit system and get information direct. Keep in touch with the Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C. and don't hesitate a minute to write for any information you want. That's what the department is for and they are glad to help all they can.

Mex., Brighton, Ill.—Mexican bonds, 5s, 1899, are quoted from 45 to 50 cents on the dollar and 4s, 1954 are quoted from 35 to 40 cents. How long it will take for them to rise, if they ever rise in value no man can tell. They may become worthless. We would not advise you to buy any of them. Any Chicago broker can give you all the information you need. Ask your nearest bank for addresses.

H. A., Aden, Cal.—Just what the demand is at present for foreign missionaries we cannot inform you as COMFORT is not quite in that line, but if you will write to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, 14 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass., making inquiries covering all the information you seek you will be reliably informed on all points. This Board, now 116 years old, is the oldest foreign missionary society in the United States and it has sent out over 3,000 missionaries to all parts of the world. It has organized 673 churches numbering since the beginning, 229,373 members. Its receipts in all have been $45,488,439, $1,102,243 of which came in during 1915.

Ruby, Vinton, Iowa.—Whenever you want government assistance, such as in mail routes and other lines, your ever present help in every time of trouble is your Representative in Congress. He is called a Representative because he is there to represent his constituents and if he does not do that properly, his constituents have the power to remove him and substitute a more efficient representative. Don't write to Department officials, but bring all your force to bear on your Congressman and you will get results, if they are getable, as they sometimes are not. Of course, you don't need COMFORT to tell you who your Representative is.

Miss B., Vinton, N. Y.—If you think you have discovered some new property in any plant, communicate your discovery to the Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C. and ask for information. If it should not be in the Department's line, your letter will be referred to the proper authorities, if you make the request.

S. J., Breese, Ill.—Goodness gracious, where have you been all this time? Of course, George Washington was married. Didn't you ever hear of George and Martha? His mother's name was Mary. Couldn't somebody in Breese have answered your question? (2) Lincoln was a Captain in a small war with the Blackfeet Indians. His real war record, however, began in 1861. You know what war that was, don't you?

J. S., Murrycross, Ala.—The next census will be taken in 1920.

Spring Trapping

Copyright, 1916, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

THE coming of spring means the end of the trapper's work. All winter he has followed the trap line, sometimes pleased and again suffering disappointment, yet, after all, the occupation has been a healthful one, and profitable as well, if the trapper has been industrious and willing to work.

As winter breaks up in the northern latitudes, animals start to "shed," that is, lose their heavy, fine fur, and as the weather becomes warmer, soon nothing but coarse hair remains.

The muskrat, a water animal, is at its best during the spring months. Trappers turn their attention to trapping this rodent, and some years find that it pays.

The muskrat is found in all parts of the United States, Alaska and Canada. Its home is around the lakes, ponds, marshes, creeks and rivers or any swamp. They live in dens in the banks of the stream, with the entrance under water or close to the edge. In the ponds and marshes they build houses out in the water, where it is shallow and ofttimes quite a number occupy the same house.

The musk of the female muskrat makes a very good scent to catch the male. Vegetable foods are best bait for muskrat. Corn, beets, parsnips, apples and the like prove luring.

It is in the spring when meat bait fails. The trapper should be sure to purchase a prepared scent. If you try one firm's without success, keep trying until you run onto the right bait. As soon as you have found a scent that will decoy the muskrat to your trap, the battle is won.

A good way to fix a trap in a water-set so as to drown the muskrat is to take a piece of No. 9 wire, five or six feet long. Wire a small stone to one end, slip the ring of the trap over the other end so it will slide down to the rock, which should be placed in deep water, the other end being fastened to the bank by a stake. When the muskrat is caught, he will make a plunge for deep water, sliding the ring to the rock. Have a small loop in the wire close to the rock so the ring will go into it. This prevents him from pulling back to the bank.

In the South and Southwest, furs become very poor early in the spring. March furs show signs of shedding, and are as poor as April caught fur in the North.

The mink is the first animal to show effects of spring. In February, the mink loses the dark, long, silky fur, and becomes faded and coarse.

Fur-bearing animals start to run in the early spring. Skunks show up very poorly as soon as warm weather starts and snow is gone.

As soon as the trapper sees he is getting poor fur, that is the time to stop. Do not continue to slay the animals because it is only killing off the fur bearer that another winter may get in your own trap and make good money for you.

Many a trapper, who has kept on when he knew it was too late, felt very badly when he found a female in his trap, be it mink, otter or any other animal, and found she was carrying her young and he had not only slain the mother but had also taken the lives of the little ones.

The raccoon in the North retains its heavy coat of fur until far into the spring, and in those states, where the law permits, can be hunted and trapped with profit until very warm, spring weather.

In the far North, fur remains good until far into the spring.

Furs should all be shipped before warm weather comes. Some trappers hold back their furs until May and June. All fur exporters buy raw furs at any time of year, but prefer to get them before the weather gets warm as moths and flies get into them very quickly.

The trapper in the far South is up against the hardest part of the business. He has only a short month or two for trapping. Furs do not get prime in Florida, southern Alabama and southern Mississippi until the middle of December and by February, they are very poor again, due to the warm weather.

Do not forget that in spring trapping, meat bait is virtually worthless without a good scent.

In trapping, should you get hold of an animal, still alive, not injured by the trap, you may be able to dispose of the animal alive at a high price.

A great many people are starting farms for the raising of foxes, skunks and other animals. Indeed, in Canada, breeders of the black and silver gray foxes are receiving thousands of dollars for such live animals.

RECIPE FOR GRAY HAIR.

To half pint of water add 1 oz. Bay Rum, a small box of Barbo Compound, and ¼ oz. of glycerine. Apply to the hair twice a week until it becomes the desired shade. Any druggist can put this up or you can mix it at home at very little cost. Full directions for making and use come in each box of Barbo Compound. It will gradually darken streaked, faded gray hair, and removes dandruff. It is excellent for falling hair and will make harsh hair soft and glossy. It will not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy, and does not rub off.—Adv.

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In order that each cousin may be answered in this column, no cousin must ask more than three questions in one Month.

HAPPY New Year! ! And, listen, my dears, I simply shan't say a thing about any resolutions you are to make or break for 1917. I've been saying things like that for so long and I haven't noticed any difference one way or another, that I have resolved not to mention the subject again. At least, not until 1918, and goodness knows, where any of us will be by that time. All I have to say now is that I wish all of you a New Year so much happier than any previous new year of your experience that 1917 will be your banner year. Now watch me go to work as though the only resolution I knew was a labor resolution.

The first letter I take up is from "Only Tom's" of Ashburnham, Mass., and Tom is the hero of the story, I suppose, because it is about a girl and boy, now nineteen and twenty, and they have been loving each other in silence and school for five long years with nothing more definite than that. Now if it were Tom who were asking about it, it would be different, but it is the girl, and if she is only Tom's, I think Tom ought to realize it and claim her. Either Tom is too stupid for any sensible girl to want, or he doesn't care for the girl who thinks she is only his. It is for her to find out which is which for Tom. She might show him this answer to begin with.

Troubled, Raleigh, N. C.—Unless your father can give perfect reasons for objecting to a man with eight hundred acres of good land, and otherwise respectable, I think you would be justified in disregarding the paternal objections. Still, if you don't love the man, and you marry him, that eight-hundred acre farm will look smaller to you every day until it gets to be almost as small as you were for marrying him.

Ruby, St. Louis, Mo.—He may have been born in Greece, but fifteen years in St. Louis has made just as good an American of him, or should have, as you say you are, and if there is no objection to him except his nationality, you tell your objecting friends that they are very un-American and you will marry the Greek. At the same time don't be too sure of him, as Greeks from ancient times have had a reputation of being somewhat unreliable in love. But most men are so, anyway, so what odds is it?

Blue-eyes, Summerfield, Okla.—If all the wives, who listened to the promises of drinking men and married them thinking they would stop drinking and they did not, could take hands the circle would extend around the earth and lap over a whole lot. If you want to get into that circle disobey your father and marry this man who promises to quit drinking after he is married. If he will not quit drinking for your sake before he is married he never will after he gets you for his wife. They never, never do. That is too true.

R. R., Fayette, Ala.—The young man is old enough to be sensible and evidently he is. He has had every opportunity to meet you and to cultivate your closer acquaintance, but beyond the few friendly courtesies he has extended and you have properly appreciated, he has made no effort to see you, which is the very best evidence that you have not inspired in him any other than the ordinary friendly feeling of one human being for another. If you are wise you will accept the situation as it is and consider him only as any other acquaintance. So far you have acted as the lady and any advances beyond those you have already made will cause the man to lose even his friendly regard for you. He knows what he wants and if he doesn't want you, all you can do to change his mind and heart will be wasted effort. I don't believe two ordinarily intelligent people ever lost each other, unless one of them wanted to be lost. Take my advice and continue doing just what you have been doing.

Minlin, Massillon, Ohio.—When a girl of twenty really wants to love a man who wants to marry her, but she has her doubts, I think, as there is no one else she cares for, that she really loves the man, but doesn't know it. Such cases are not at all uncommon and I have known several very happy marriages which have taken place in just such doubt as troubles you. As you can very well wait a year, do so, or try to, for I think you will marry before the year is out. You have my blessing.

Anxious, Yarbro, Ark.—Being twenty years old and a schoolmarm ought to be a double source of knowledge, but it does not seem to be because you have not yet learned that the girl who thinks least of finding a young man the young men think most of finding. You have always been popular, isn't that enough? Why narrow down to one to command you, when you have them all to command?

A. F., Holland, N. Y.—Really, my dear, I didn't suppose there was a fifteen-year-old girl in the state of New York who could write a letter showing so few signs of the existence of a public school system. Forget the beaus and devote yourself to books for three years steady.

M. B. H., Post City, Texas.—There is no more harm in cousins kissing than there is in other people kissing, so long as it is not done to excess.

Four Girls, Osgood, Ind.—Four girls with but a single thought and that thought beaus, and yet all your letters are as well written as though you never heard of a beau. I congratulate the Hoosier school system.

Violet, Katemcy, Texas.—By all means do not encourage the young man to forget the girl he is engaged to because her father objects to their marrying. You can be his friend without trying to steal him from his proper owner, can't you? Besides, if you did coax him away, don't you know some other girl could coax him away from you just as easily?

Blue Eyes, Mapleton, Oregon.—If you do not love the man you have promised to marry, you had better break the engagement than break up a home after you have married and started one. As you are wholly unfitted to be anybody's wife now, I advise you to wait four years. Maybe by the time you are twenty-one you will measure more nearly up to marriage as it should be.

Lass, Willard, Ga.—Ordinarily I would not advise a girl of twenty to marry a man twenty years older, but there are so many marriages with that difference in ages, or even greater, which have turned out beautifully, that I have nothing to say in opposition when two people after a thorough understanding and with a sure faith in each other agree to marry and do marry. You have my blessing.

Idaba, Afton, Iowa.—As you quarrel with one about the other, throw him over and take up the other, then quarrel again and exchange again, and do this at intervals of varying frequency. It seems to me that you should obey your father and give up beaus until you can manage them better.

Pansy Bloom, Birmingham, Ala.—When a man is thirty he should not dilly-dally about marrying, but should either take the girl, or give her up. Your sweetheart, I think, is indifferent and would rather you found some one to take his place than not, and I am sure you would stop your worrying over the situation if you made up your mind to quit and actually did quit. You say you have plenty of attention and if you have, why bother about this man who wants you to lose him?

Anxious, Petersburg, Va.—Your condition is hopeless and nothing can save you but divine interposition. You are in love with this utterly unworthy young man and whatever he says or does is better in your sight than all the advice that can be given to you. You own a car, you say, but if that car gave you one hundredth part as much trouble by its defects as this young man does by his, you would throw it on the junk pile and sue the manufacturers for damages. It's a shame and a pity that you haven't as good man sense as you have car sense, because if you had you wouldn't pick up any old thing simply because you thought it was nicer than any other. I have no advice to give you, for advice is wasted on your kind, my dear. You have my sympathy, though.

D. B., Iola, Fla.—Thank you, Della, for your first letter, but why did you write "I would of asked," instead of writing it properly? Do Iola grammars sanction such a verb as "would of?"

Reader, Columbia, S. C.—I suppose every normal girl has some one star of hope somewhere in the unmeasured spaces of her heart's desire, just as you have, and I don't think she would be normal if she hadn't. As yours seems to hover over a pulpit and you feel called to become a clergyman's wife, I think you should listen to the call. It isn't every girl who is fitted to be the wife of a preacher and when one believes she is, she should be true to her belief. (2) You have the poetic sense, but you must read a great deal of good poetry and study it before trying to write it for print. You can only judge poor poetry by knowing the best. ,

There, my dears, your questions are answered and though I have had to be rather scoldy at times, you made me do it by the way some of you act when you ought to know better. Still, I am doing it all for the best and I want to give all of you a good start for the new year. By, by and may 1917 blessings follow you and catch up with you every day. COUSIN MARION.

fur-trimmed skirts knocked against her ankles.

"You can lend me something, can't you?"

Kit looked with some anxiety at her pretty brown frock. She had wanted to look well tonight! And what had poor Agatha to lend her that was pretty?

"Poor Agatha," in very truth, had nothing.

She turned over her frocks in vain. They were big enough for three such people as Kit. Then she went in despair to the big cedar-lined chest wherein such dresses of her mother's reposed as had not been degraded into every-day garments. On the top lay what was formerly called pelisse, made of dark sapphire-blue satin, it was trimmed royally with ermine and lined with white fur.

Agatha seized it and returned from her chilly, barn-like chamber to the warm retreat of the guest. Truly, she and Nerine had spent a pound of their money in "things wanted," but wanted only for the comfort of Kit Belton.

"Here, my dear," she cried, holding the sumptuous garment to the fire till the smell of cedar came from its warm folds like incense.

The dead Mrs. Mayne had been, like her daughters, a woman of height and presence. Her tight-fitting outdoor garment was very loose and long for the girl who put it on. Its wide, fur-lined sleeves fell away from Kit's pretty arms, and its ermine collar had to be lapped over at the throat.

"Now shoes! Mine will fall off your feet, but I can't do any better," Agatha said, producing a well-worn pair of satin slippers long her "best."

Kit laughed as she shuffled past the cheval glass in her ancient garments. Her throat was whiter than the ermine, her deep eyes bluer than the satin of the pelisse. And her shoes could be hidden.

Agatha, the economical, extinguished the sinful luxury of wax candles and led the way once more through the tortuous passages back to the one room in Lispenard House where she and Nerine spent their waking lives.

The table was drawn up beside the fire. The cold chicken had a place of honor, while the smiling Jane took the cover off the mound of mashed potatoes browned to a turn. The brass tea kettle sung cheerily on the hob. In the lamplight the apricot jam and the clotted cream seemed begging to be eaten, and the royally-robed guest had a royal appetite after her long day in the train.

"We will wait on ourselves, Jane," Nerine said, graciously, ignoring with delightful calm the fact that Jane knew no more of waiting than of playing the violin, "and you must go down to the station and tell them to send up Miss Belton's boxes."

Jane, all eagerness to inform her "young man" that her master's absence would nullify for a month the decree of "no followers," dropped a courtesy and retired. The hostess and the guest applied themselves with the zest of youth to chicken and potatoes, to hot cakes and tea.

Mr. Mayne would have wrung his hands at seeing any human being so trifle with his digestion, but then Mr. Mayne was miles on his road to Dover.

There was a certain strangeness about the little group seated round the table in the corner by the fire. The room so bare, white walled, black beamed; the huge fireplace, the wide, white hearth, the ancient leather-covered chairs high in the back, low in the legs.

Kit surveyed the sisters over her last cup of tea in silence.

"You are more alike than ever," she said at last. "But you look so grand! So old, somehow!"

They really were a stately pair, black haired, gray eyed, creamy skinned, with small, round waists and long limbs. As like to the dead Lispenards as to each other.

"Old!" cried Nerine. "We are twenty, while Mr. Mayne is away. When he is here we are forty-six, if you like. Anxious, suspicious, nagged at, we get fresh wrinkles every day."

"We are a little more than a year older than you—and Maurice," Agatha said, in a matter-of-fact way. "You haven't ever asked about Maurice, Kit."

"No. How is he?" Very slowly into Kit's cheeks came a maddening color. She felt it deepening, burning. "I heard from him the other day," she added, hesitatingly, not looking at the sisters.

Heard from him! Read, instead, had stood in a country lane with him—had let the winter rain stream down on her unheeded. Mindful only of strong young arms about her, kisses from smooth, unmustached young lips on her cheeks.

"When? How was he?" the twins cried in a breath.

Maurice was their nursling, their all-in-all, and they had no letter from him for a fortnight.

"Last week." Today being Monday, Saturday the date of that secret tryst in the rain. "He didn't say how he was," truthfully, "but I fancy he was very well." Remembering the browned, strong face, so manly for his nineteen years, the masterful lips and words of that young lover who had walked fifteen miles each way to meet her.

"I wish he could come over," Agatha said, wistfully. "But it only means his losing time, and he hates it here. The old man's meannesses nearly kill Maurice. We"—laughing—"are much more tough!"

"What was that?" cried Kit.

She leaped from her seat at the table and stood trembling like a leaf.

Clang! Clang!

Two heavy strokes from a brazen-throated, iron-tongued bell struck, pulsed and echoed through the great empty house.

Kit's nerve was not at its best. She grew pale and cold.

Clang!

Nerine jumped from her chair.

"The old bell!" she cried. "Who can be ringing it? Who knows where it is but ourselves—and Mr. Mayne?"

In answer, the bell began to swing regularly to and fro.

"Come, Agatha—come and see!"

Nerine lighted a candle and hurried out of the room, shielding her feeble light as she ran. Agatha quickly followed her.

What if Mayne had returned?

As they vanished in the chilly passage, the bell, with one final reverberation, stopped.

It was as old as the house and unused for years. To get at its dust-clogged, spider-webbed bell rope you pushed back a tiny panel in the old porch. Kit had never known that it existed.

She stood a statue of fear, her eyes big and wide. For Kit was a coward, an arrant and hopeless one, and the three girls were alone in the house. Terrors of burglars and murderers appalled her; chill, supernatural stories crowded to her mind; ghostly thoughts turned her cold. If no one knew of that bell but the girls and Mr. Mayne, and he was on his way to France and they safely in this room, what mortal hand could have rung it?

She stopped her ears. At least if it rang she would not hear it.

Her yellow hair against the lamplight made a halo round her head. Her wide sleeves had fallen back from her upraised arms. She stared at the black void passage through the open door.

Some one hurried along it—a man's hasty, thick-shod feet drew nearer. Kit shut her eyes. This was not velvet-footed Clarence Mayne!

At the door the newcomer paused; he tried to speak; but only made an inarticulate sound of pure delight. But it was enough for Miss Belton.

"Maurice!" she shrieked.

She tried to run across the room to him in Agatha's shoes, which were so big for her little feet. They came off; the long gown tripped her. Maurice Lispenard made a spring and caught her to him.

"Dearest, dearest Kit!" he said.

She had really been horribly frightened, and there had been a strain on her nerves all day. What with getting away from a reluctant mother, evading Mr. Mayne, secretly expecting Maurice, whom, after all, she had never connected with that awful ghostly bell. She clung to him all unnerved. For one instant!

Agatha and Nerine's voices came before them up the passage. Kit pushed Maurice's eager hands and smooth, cool face away angrily—ungratefully.

"What on earth do you mean," she demanded, "by coming and frightening us all like this?"

"But you knew I was coming," he replied, rather staggered.

"I didn't know you were ringing that horrid bell," artfully clasping her hands over her joyful heart. "I nearly died of fright! I thought you were a burglar come to murder me!" she declared in that tragic voice in which we are wont to speak of our own death. "Why couldn't you have rung the ordinary door bell?"

"I did; but considering that there were no servants in the house, that you were all in here boxed up, and"—with a significant glance at the table—"gormandizing, old Mayne's electric tinkle didn't make much impression. I was about tired of cooling myself in the delightfully seasonable weather."

Agatha and Nerine came in at this instant, transfigured from the warlike Amazons who had gone to investigate the unseemly summons of the bell.

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

In order to meet the demand for information made by COMFORT subscribers on the kindred subjects of Etiquette and Personal Appearance, this column will be devoted to them, and all questions will be answered, but no inquirer shall ask more than two questions each month. We would suggest to readers to cut this column out and paste it in a scrap book. Address letters to Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

T. and T., Montrose, Colo.—If the young man who comes to see you needs to be entertained more than to be in your company and to talk with you, he is not any kind of a young man to go to see a girl. If you have no musical instruments in the house and both of you together can't entertain each other in conversation, you might try a game of checkers, or backgammon, or pingpong, or bridge, or some one of those pleasant parlor games which are used to pass the tedious time away. (2) When a couple returns from an entertainment that one which feels the more grateful for favors should thank the other. Really, though, the lady should thank the gentleman as the courtesy comes from him, but the thanks should not be formal as though he had passed her the pie at dinner. (3) Young ladies who are so sensitive, or so silly, as to feel embarrassed at a corset advertisement on the screen should only go to the movies with their parents. Newspaper and magazine reading young ladies see so much of that sort of advertising they never notice it at all, or if they do, they learn what they can from it to guide them in their next purchases. The average intelligent, decent young man, if he notices it at all, speaks of it merely as a business matter. (4) If the gentleman driving with the lady gives her a box of candy she should open it and offer it to him.

Juliana, Chicago, Ill.—You should, Miss Juliana, have more of the spirit of Pollyanna—Chicago knows Pollyanna by now, doesn't it?—and instead of waiting for others to bring joy to you, you should bring joy to them. You see, you are expecting people to do things for you, when the happy way is to do things for them. The big city is not the little town and city people are shy of each other unless they are encouraged not to be. Now if you want friends, don't stand back for them to come to you, but having chosen such as you feel you will like, seek them in a nice, friendly manner and you will nearly always find they will be glad enough to meet you half-way because generally they want friends just as you do. Never try to go where you are not wanted and you will never be rebuffed. Too many young people who go to the city want to start in at the top and that is no starting-place. That is the stopping place. The safest and sanest course is to identify yourself with some leading church organization and gain recognition among its members by your activity and usefulness in its work. You don't have to be goody-goody, but good.

Blue Eyes, Bristol, W. Va.—It would have been quite improper for you to have asked the young man you had just met to call. The mother of a fifteen-year-old girl is the proper person to invite young men to call at her house.

Jolly Kid, Arlington, Ohio.—If you are really good looking and the young man told you you were, you could do as you please about considering him a gentleman and accepting the compliment. But if you were not good looking and he told you you were, then by all means consider him a gentleman and accept the compliment with a grateful heart.

Broken-hearted, Attalla, Ala.—You are not the only wife whose domestic happiness has been wrecked by the interference of her husband's people and as he is too weak to go away with you to some place where you could be free of them, we think, as you have no children, that it would be better if you went alone and made your living at whatever you could do best. You love each other and when he had learned that he could not have you and his people too, he would leave his people and come to you. It is at least worth trying and no disgrace would attach to you if you remained true to him and made your life an example for him to follow.

E. M. D., Winchester, Ill.—As a matter of manners as well as of morals your duty to yourself and society is to have no more to do with the young man. He has proved himself unworthy in more ways than one and your self-respect should prompt you to recognize him no longer. You say you do not care for him, and we say you care more for him than you do for yourself or you would not be worrying over him.

Perplexed, Wenatchee, Wash.—The rule is that the gentleman walk on the outside of the sidewalk, because there he serves as a sort of protection to the lady from the street traffic. But the rule is not rigorous and unless there is actual necessity for him to take the outside he does not. "Changing gears"—as you aptly put it—at every change of sidewalk is annoying and should not be done. The best manners are not those made by stiff rules and regulations and the people who depend upon conventions to the exclusion of common sense have the least attractive manners. P. S. You ask us to use the name "Preplexed," but why not "Perplexed," as we have spelled it?

Mrs. B., Dubuque, Iowa.—You are over-conscientious and want to do ten times as much harm trying to do what you think is right than if you let the matter remain as it is. The old lady who found the ten dollars and turned it into Christmas gifts for the poor may have been over-zealous in good works and probably she should have hunted up the owner of the money and nobody would have got any good of it. As you and other needy persons knowing nothing of how she got the money, benefited by it and nobody was harmed, we think, any effort now, after years, to find the owner and restore what little you received is extremely foolish and can only do harm to the memory of the kind old lady. We almost feel like classing you with the undeserving poor and will, if you persist in your folly.

Two Chums, Asheville, N. C.—There is no set time for the giving of an engagement ring after the engagement has been made, and there should be no rushing hurry about it, but the man should be ready to give the girl the ring whenever she wants it. If he assumes a right that he is the one to say when the ring should be given he is making a mistake and the sooner it is shown to him the better. (2) An engaged girl should not accept the attentions of any other man, or men, except with the knowledge and consent of the man who has an established claim upon her. If he does not object, nobody else has a right to.

Blue Eyes, Berlin, Wis.—Judging from the grammar and spelling of your letter we should say it was the height of impropriety for you to quit school. We hope the music you are taking will not sound like your letter does. It is proper to go to dancing school, but we think your head rather than your heels needs educating.

E. C., Manes, Mo.—"Vura" sounds to us like a girl's name, but it is one of those genderless names which agrees with any nominative that gets it. Some good names for girls are Judith, Ruth, Malva, Dorothy, Content, Prudence, Beatrice, Beulah, Fairfax, Elizabeth, Ethel, Freda, and names made up of other names and places, thus giving originality as well as other attractive qualities. We know a girl named Edwa for an Uncle Edward, there being no boy in the family to take his name. And a boy named Wilmar, for his father, William, and the mother, Mary.

Two Brown Eyes, Coinjock, N. C.—Not one of the three things you ask us is "propper." Neither is the way you spell it. Try again.

Troubled Wife, Red Springs, Texas.—If as you say, you really love your husband as no woman ever loved her husband, it must be rather a peculiar love, or you would not be finding fault so seriously with him that you ask us if you should separate from him. Love like yours ought to find some other way to happiness than by giving up your husband. Think about your five month old baby and see if you can't do better than separation.

Rainbow, Sand Patch, Pa.—Every now and again in all parts of the country some nice young man becomes the object of adoration of some silly girl and life thereafter is a burden of joy to him. You are in that class and the girl will not give you a moment's peace unless you snub her outrageously, or pack up your duffle and move to parts unknown until she recovers her senses. Most people look upon it as a joke, but it is anything but that to the man, and to the girl it is a matter for the attention of alienists, or experts in mental disorders. The only answer to your other questions about silly girls is that the Lord made them that way. Young men are just as silly, but it doesn't seem to be quite so objectionable in them.

Chums, Shobuta, Miss.—As both of you distrust the young men who are courting you, why not discard them and get trustworthy ones as substitutes? There can be no lasting love unless there is perfect trust.

Children's Happy Hour

Martha's Kitten

Copyright, 1916, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

THE hair on Martha's kitten is so crumply and fluffy that it seems the name "Rags" fits it exactly. It likes to play in the clothes basket and climb up the curtains and sit on grandma's chair and do other naughty things but it has one trick that makes it liked by everyone. It can find lost articles, even in the dark. If you drop a needle or a pin or a coin on the floor, all you have to do is to put Rags searching and the first thing you know you will have it again. No wonder Martha likes her so well.

Once, when the whole family went on a picnic Martha cried because they would not let her take Rags along. Her mother was firm however, and the child had to give in.

Every summer Martha goes to visit her Aunt May who lives in another city. Last month Aunt May's only daughter was married and Martha went there for the wedding. She had two new dresses for the occasion and two hats to match as you can see by the picture.

How to take Rags with her, was a problem, for the railroad men do not allow kittens on a train. If the poor pussy stayed at home there would be no one to take care of her for the whole family was going to make the trip. The only scheme Martha could think of was to pack Rags in a basket and cover her up. They only had to ride three hours and surely a kitten could keep quiet for that long. She managed it all right but several times Rags meowed and Martha had to sing to drown out the sound. At last they arrived but the child was horrified to learn that her aunt had a bulldog that hated cats. You may be sure Martha locked her pet carefully in an up-stairs room and kept a good watch on the bulldog.

Everything was noise and excitement that day. Young and old romped on the lawn and played games but towards evening there was a sudden stop to the merrymaking and the word went round that the bride had lost her diamond ring. This was bad news indeed. With tense faces everyone began to search and not an inch of the whole big grounds was neglected. Alas, it was all in vain. The bride was trying to control her feelings but when darkness started to fall and the ring seemed lost beyond hope, she broke down and cried bitterly.

Martha felt very sorry for her and longed to be of some help. Like a flash, the thought came to her that perhaps Rags might be able to find the ring. Rushing up-stairs she carried the kitten down and set her loose in the long grass, explaining as best she could that she wanted her to search for something. Rags seemed to understand and began scratching around. Suddenly pussy arched her back and raced like fury for a tree. The bulldog was after her and she beat him only by inches to her perch in the fork of the limbs.

Martha screamed and told the older folks what she was trying to make the kitten do.

The dog was locked up and then a man held Martha up high while she coaxed Rags down. She was sitting there with something in her paws and our little friend yelled with joy when she saw what it was, for sure enough, it was the lost ring. Oh, how happy everyone was. Martha was proud of her kitten but it will never be known exactly how that ring got up in the tree. Maybe Rags carried it up, maybe the girl, in tossing a ball, threw it up there herself. The kitten is the only one that knows and she, alas, cannot tell.

Cut-Out Doll Directions

Paste the entire picture on a piece of cardboard (using boiled flour paste) and smooth, with the hands from the center towards the edges. Put it in a large book to dry and let it remain there at least three hours. Cut out each doll, dress and hat with scissors and color them with crayons, chalk or water colors. The front and back of the doll are pasted together to form one figure. The front and back views of each of the two hats are also pasted together. To put the hats on, slit them on the dotted line, and press down over head. The dresses are folded at the dotted line and fit down over head and shoulders. The little flaps are bent in and pasted together. To make this double dolly stand bend the base strip back at the ends to form a corner or angle. Tell Uncle John if you like this kind of a double doll the best.

built up. I suppose you know if a baby is not properly nourished, its bones become soft and pliable, owing to the absence of lime in its food. It is just the same with the human brain. It has got to be fed properly or it becomes a tank of mush, and its possessor a menace to society. Now try and arrange your recreation and joy riding so that your brain and soul may receive attention, so that you may have so much outdoor exercise, so much pleasure and so much mental food, and mental feed of the right kind. Don't let anything conquer you. If you find you are getting too fond of any one thing, shut down on it. Keep a stiff grip on the help of your ship of life. Don't let the waves of pleasure run you on the rocks, or the winds of vice blow you to damnation. Develop character. It is the greatest thing in the world, it is the pendulum of the spirit and the anchor of the soul. It is the lack of it that sweeps millions of pleasure loving moths into the scorching flames of loose, aimless, senseless, godless living, flames which if they do not destroy, utterly and eternally mar. Be temperate and moderate, that is the only way to enjoy anything for excess soon palls, soon kills. Enough is as good as a feast. Two thousand years ago the Romans after gorging themselves with a score or so of courses at one of their sumptuous banquets, forced their fingers down their throats, so as to eject all they had eaten, and thus make room for more. Can you imagine what a revolting sight that was? And yet the nobles of Rome and their grand ladies indulged in those filthy practises and thought it perfectly correct. We are not quite as bad as that today, but we could very easily fall as low if we did not take a grip on ourselves. So once more don't neglect your church even for the best limousine on earth. Don't neglect your books, nor your work, nor those who have a claim on your time and attention for mere pleasure. There is more joy in the higher and loftier things of life than in the grosser and more sensual things. You may not realize this now, but some day you will, and realize it probably when it is too late. Take a leaf out of Alvin's book. Here is a boy who is apparently trying to live a well-regulated life. Go thou and do likewise.

Comfort's Bedtime Stories For Little Folks!

A Library of Cute Little Books

40 WONDERFUL TALES IN STORY AND VERSE 40

Beautifully Illustrated

Library of 12 Sent For One Subscription!

The stories of our childhood—how well we remember them. After all it seems but a short time since we listened with rapt attention to the adventures of Robinson Crusoe cast away on his lonely island—of beautiful Cinderella, the fairy and the prince—the tragic fate of poor little Red Riding Hood—these were only a few of the marvelous tales that thrilled our childish imagination and helped us spend many blissful hours.

The children of today are the same as they were fifty years ago. And these good old-time stories are just as popular with the young folks now as they were then. So we have decided to give our little boy and girl friends a fine big collection of these stories including some of the old-time favorites as well as a number of newer and later books equally as interesting. We have arranged three different sets or "libraries"—each library consisting of twelve books, no two alike, and you can have your choice of any one library, or two libraries, or all three libraries. Library No. 7951 comprises the following twelve titles:

Library No. 7991 has these twelve titles:

The Shepherd And His Sheep, Young America, The Deep Blue Sea, Land of Tulips, Rex and Rover, Our Farm Yard, Little Darlings, Childhood of Hiawatha, Faithful Friends, The Fancy Dress Party, Our Country, Happy Days.

Library No. 8001 consists of these twelve titles:

Little Sweethearts, The Story of Little Piggie Wig, In The Jungle, The Big League, Doggie Doings, Fred's Feathered Friends, Uncle Jerry's Farm, Chums, The Story of Santa Claus, Little Laddies, Pussy's Pranks, Faithful And True.

As these stories are intended for the younger children some of them have been "boiled down" to the fewest and simplest words so that they are not as complete as the original editions, but all of them are printed on fine paper in large clear type that is easy to see and read and have no less than five beautiful full page illustrations in colors.

Some of the titles named above of course need no introduction. The other titles are just the sort of stories that delight every child—stories of childish sports, flowers, the sea, Indians, animal pets, horses, donkeys, dogs, bunnies, pussy cats, chickens, lambs, etc., wonderful romances in which there are old Stone Castles, Kings, Queens, Princes, Princesses, Good Fairies, and Wicked Fairies, stories of the Bear Family—Pa Bear, old Ma Bear and little "Teddy" Bear, stories of little Playmates, the true tale of the Teddy Bears—in fact the finest collection of juvenile short stories ever published. Each book is nicely bound with a handsomely illustrated cover in colors and is 4 inches by 5¼ inches in size.

There is nothing you could get for the children that would make them any happier than one or more of these cute libraries and best of all it will cost you nothing as we are giving them away as a premium. We will send you free your choice of any one, two, or all three libraries—each library consisting of twelve stories, each story in a book by itself, twelve different books in all—on the terms of the following special offers:

The Family Doctor

So many inquiries are received from COMFORT subscribers concerning the health of the family that this column will be devoted to answering them. The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be addressed to physicians, not to us.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this and all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

Irene, Springdale, Wash.—If the doctor, after examination, said you would have to go to a hospital for an operation, he certainly knew better than we do here in Maine, three thousand miles away. Wens and tumors are not exactly the same, but a wen may develop into a tumor, though a tumor will never develop into a wen. Some of the smaller wens may be removed, absorbed, without an operation, but when they are of larger size, only an operation will remove them, though many persons prefer the inconvenience, often the disfigurement, of a wen than risk an operation, which ordinarily is not at all serious. If you are not able to go to a hospital you might find a physician in your neighborhood who would be willing to operate if you were willing to permit him to do so.

Anxious Mother, Galion, Ohio.—We do not know of any human being who doesn't at times have backache and with some it is a serious matter. The ache may be due to numerous causes and the causes have much to do with the seriousness of the trouble. First then in treatment is to learn the cause and treat that. In many cases it can not be removed and relief is as much as can be expected. Usually this relief is found in hot applications, massaging, or in liniments, one of the best of these being chloroform liniment. Internal remedies must also be taken, but these vary so much that they can be prescribed only by a physician according to what is required in the treatment. Back-ache frequently comes from cold and is only temporary, a few applications of a mustard plaster, or liniment being all the treatment necessary. Lumbago and the other serious forms of backache require a physician's care. Your case seems to be in the serious class, though at your age you should be able to overcome it to a great extent, though you will always have touches of it, due partly to weather, to too much meat-eating, to carelessness in taking cold and almost innumerable other violations of nature's laws. Go to a physician, but do not take his advice or his medicine until he knows all you can tell him of the trouble and shows an intelligent appreciation of your condition. You pay him for what he does and you are entitled to intelligent and careful treatment. Most patients know so little about themselves that they are willing to believe anything a doctor tells them and the doctor knowing their ignorance tells them anything he pleases. At the same time, remember that disease in many instances is beyond the power of even the greatest physicians.

Mrs. E., Beatrice, Nebr.—How do you know the child has something the matter with his kidneys? Have you made a study of human kidneys and know the symptoms of disease? Judging from what you say, you do not, yet you are trying to do for your child what only a skilled physician should do. You are one of those COMFORT mothers who hazard the future health and happiness of their children by guessing at their ailments and applying home remedies. Take the baby to a doctor and have it examined and treated properly.

J. V., Sioux Falls, S. Dak.—Urinary troubles are common among men of fifty and past and are the result of age, but a man of thirty-nine should not be so troubled. That you are is due to some cause which only an examining physician can determine and whatever it is, the chances are that restoration to normal will be slow. Treatment unless you are examined is mere guesswork and valueless. As for the constipation, if you will exercise some care in your diet and will take with your meals a good, big handful of prepared bran, to be had at any grocery cheap, you will find within a week or two that your bowels will move as much as is needed and by continuing the bran, increasing or decreasing the quantity, as may be, you will in the course of a few months be practically rid of your constipation. With that removed, your bladder trouble will no doubt be relieved if not cured. The bran is harmless and is itself a healthful food. Bran rolls are delicious. But see a physician about your bladder trouble.

Ellen, Lebanon, Ind.—If pumpkin pie is injurious to kidneys millions of people in this broad land of ours are joyously injuring their kidneys every fall. If you have any serious fears about it, suppose you restrict yourself to about a pie and a half a day and two on Sunday. That won't hurt you. (2) The swelling of your finger joints indicates rheumatism and now is the time to see a doctor and begin a course of preventive treatment. You will have a fearful time and awful looking hands if you neglect it. Have the doctor prescribe a diet for you, which is more important now than any other treatment. (3) Don't worry about the flashes of light you think you see when the room is dark. Take a dose of calomel at long intervals to liven up your liver.

Mrs. L. N., Decatur, Ill.—The itching on the l gs and the powdery scruff may be relieved if not wholly cured by rubbing the skin night and morning with cocoa-butter, a most excellent and safe skin food for any part of the body, and very soothing to the nerves which cause the itching. Get it at any drug-store in a half pound cake.

Worried, Sunset, Texas.—If a woman has been suffering with nervous hysteria during pregnancy the child is likely to be similarly affected, but not necessarily so. Much depends upon the general mental and physical health of the mother. Any physical defect from that cause is hardly probable. A nervous predisposition might result, but if the child were otherwise strong, this would probably be outgrown under favorable conditions.

M. B., Covina, Cal.—Blood pressure can only be safely reduced by consulting a physician, and not always then. Blood pressure is the result of excessive heart action, or of contraction and clogging of the arteries and it is not a condition for the layman however intelligent to attempt to treat except under a physician's direction. If you are subject to disordered circulation it may not be necessary for you to see the doctor on all occasions, but you should have instructions from him as to what you can do for your own relief.

A. M., Riegelsville, Pa.—The red face and pimples are more the result of your youth than of any actual disorder and you will outgrow that before long. In the mean time eat very little greasy or sweet food and keep your face well massaged and thoroughly clean. The only medicine you need is a dose two or three times a week of Epsom salts before breakfast in a glass of hot water.

Flol, Bluefield, W. Va.—In the same space in no part of the body are there so many different muscles, tissues, nerves, organs and so forth to get out of order as in the throat, or the neck, rather. The choking pain you feel there may be ordinary sore throat, or tonsilitis, or laryngitis, or pharyngitis or bronchitis or some of the others and until you know which one to treat, you cannot treat any of them. Throat troubles are never trifling and they always have a meaning of their own which you will do well to talk to a doctor about and let him look down in there and see what is wrong.

J. V., Roll, Okla.—The disproportionate size of your calves is largely natural as your mother is similarly affected and very little, if anything, can be safely done to reduce their size. As long as they give you no trouble or inconvenience and your general health is all right, you shouldn't worry. Think how very much worse they would be if you had elephantiasis. Besides, ladies don't wear such short skirts in Oklahoma as they do in the East, do they?

Mrs. J. T., Dosiville, Miss.—In wearing Job's Tears as a charm against goiter, each person puts them on as she pleases and no arbitrary directions are to be followed. When you have charmed away a case of real goiter with Job's Tears, or anybody's else let us know with all details. Such treatment is a humbug. (2) We hope you are not like some of the COMFORT mothers we have to scold because they insist upon doctoring their babies when they have to guess what the matter is and then guess what is good for it.

If you want to know how to treat a teething child properly take it to a doctor and let him tell you as you should be told.

Erk, Baltimore, Md.—Malodorous feet are more or less natural and to cure is not wholly possible. The feet should be washed at least twice daily, with a few drops of ammonia in the water, thin stockings should be worn and shoes which let as much air as possible to the feet. Tan shoes are no worse than others, unless they are made of leather, or sizing used, which prevents ventilation. For that reason rubbers should not be worn, except when absolutely necessary. Air is the best disinfectant.

Mrs. J., Cazenovia, Wis.—Children frequently get foreign substances into their noses, throats or ears, and sometimes with disastrous results. The button your child got into its nose may have gone on into the throat and stomach and will cause no further troubles, but we are inclined to think it has found a lodgment back in the nasal passages somewhere and you should take the child to a physician who can examine it and remove it if it is still there, because it is sure to do injury. Why you did not go at once to a doctor passes our understanding.

J. E. J., Philadelphia, Pa.—If your skin is so tender you should not be so particular to have your face scraped to the quick, but give it a good once-over, shaving with the grain. You can get various depilatories at any drug-store, but their constant use will injure the skin. (2) Don't try to get your chalk and orris root to make suds in your mouth. That can only be done by chemical action which is more hurtful to the teeth than the plain dentifrices which do not suds.

Mrs. L. W., Humboldt, Kans.—Some cases of some kinds of eczema are incurable and though yours may not be one of those, you are only aggravating it by washing your hands so often. Soap and water are poison to eczema. Did you ever try wearing rubber gloves at your work? Don't be discouraged and every time you hear of a remedy you haven't tried, try it. Also keep your blood in good condition and make a study of the correct diet for eczematous patients. You may conquer it yet.

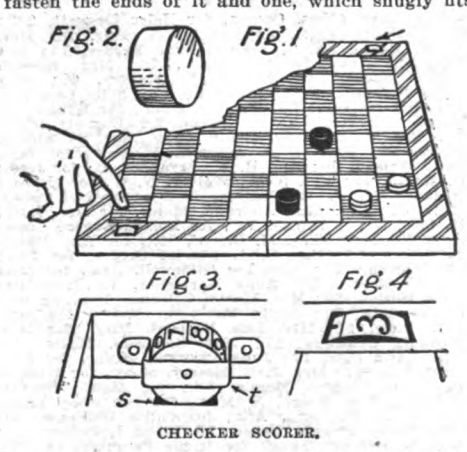
A Corner for Boys

By Uncle John

WELL boys, the earth has revolved around the sun once more and our calendars tell us that a year has gone. May the new one be happy and prosperous for you. This department, as you know, treats largely on, "making things." In a certain sense, that is all there is to life, simply "making things." We make friends; we make plans; we make resolutions; we make journeys; we make a career. We must learn to like this business of making, if we are to be successful. No man is, of himself, greater than any other man, but his work or the thing he makes may be superior, whether it is a poem or a law or a chicken coop. We are judged by the things we do and our value to mankind is measured solely by what we create for the common good. Let this thought guide you during the twelvemonth now at hand. Consider the year a blank book and each day a spotless page upon which will be recorded only deeds of worth and merit, and make it your proud task to see that when the end is reached, it will not be still a blank book.

Simple Coaster

The rough-and-ready coaster is easily made. For runners you need two 24-inch lengths of sound scantling curved as shown in the picture. The cutting is done with a compass saw, the trimming with a wood chisel and the final smoothing with sandpaper. In Figs. 2 and 4 you can see how the runners are joined by means of two cross cleats or braces. The fastening should be with long screws and a hole should be bored for each screw before inserting it. The top platform is 22 inches by 30 inches and may consist of three 10-inch boards laid at right angles to the runners. Fasten them with countersunk screws. The holes bored for the rope handles are slightly larger in diameter than the rope used. The top of the sled may be padded with carpet or canvas. It takes some nerve to ride like the boys shown in the picture but of course you can ride sitting down if you wish to.

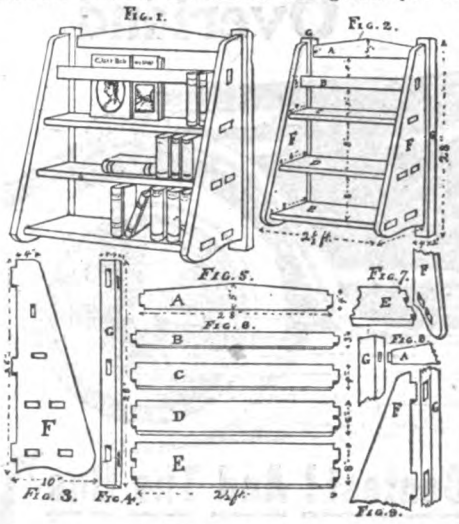


THE FEARLESS COASTERS.

Telling a Girl's Age

Young ladies, as a rule, do not like to tell how old they are, but you can find out a bashful girl's age by submitting to her the following arithmetical problem. Tell her to put down the number of the month in which she was born, then to multiply it by two, then to add five, then to multiply it by 50, then to add her age, then to substract 365, then to add 115, then ask her to tell you the amount she has left. The two figures to the right will tell you her age and the remaining one or more, the month of her birth. For example, if the amount is 822, she is 22 years of age and was born in the month of August. It will come out right every time, but, it is, of course, essential that the questions be answered truthfully and the calculation be accurately performed.

Checker Game Scorer

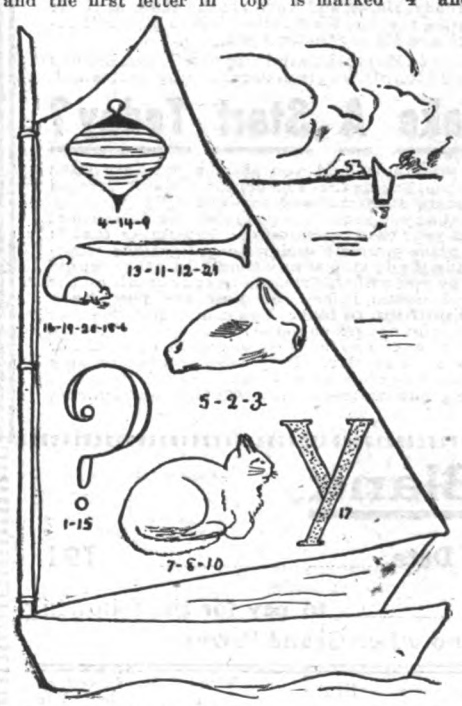


After you have played checkers for an hour or two with a friend who is about an equal match for you, you will be sure that you have won a majority of the games and he will be equally certain that he has. A good way to avoid such disputes is to equip your board with the simple scoring device shown in the accompanying sketch. It is pictured, in the rough form, in Fig. 2. A disk of wood one quarter inch thick and one inch in diameter will be about the right size or you might use a silk spool or an extra checker for the scorer. Figures are marked on the outer edge or curved surface and a gimlet hole bored in the center. Fig. 3 presents a view of a corner of the checker-board turned upside down. The letter "t" is a strip of tin or brass, upon which the wheel is mounted. Small screws are used to fasten the ends of it and one, which snugly fits the center hole, serves as an axle. A small oblong opening is made in the top of the board so that a portion of the wheel, bearing one number, may be seen. Fig. 4 makes this very clear. One of the scoring disks is placed at each of two diagonal corners. They will be found a genuine help and might be called peace makers. When you win a game push your disk around a notch and let your opponent, in like manner, keep track of his own victories.

CHECKER SCORER.

Book Shelf

This book shelf is constructed without the use of nails or screws. Mortise and tenon joints are used and glue holds them fast. First mark out and saw a side like Fig. 3. Fig. 2 shows the distance between the shelves and guides you in cutting the slots for the shelf ends. The slots are all the same size. They are cut by first boring one half inch holes and then squaring up same with a small wood chisel. Fig. 4 is two by four inches. The slots in it are one half inch deep. Figs. 7, 8 and 9 indicate how the parts are fitted together. Use white or yellow pine for the shelf and stain it a dark oak when complete. It is a very good plan for practise work. Extreme accuracy and neatness are essential. One way to vary the idea is not to cut the slots all the way through the sides. The drawings show the plan of construction more clearly by letting them come through but it is really not necessary and is a matter of individual taste. A shelf like this is nice for a boy's study corner and might hold stationery and much used reference books. The fine fitting is done with sandpaper. All parts are put together temporarily and when improvement seems impossible the liquid glue is used. First apply a thin coating and let it dry for a filler, then another is put on and the parts to be joined quickly brought together and clamped or weighted or tied until the glue has set. A whole day and night of the dryest weather is not too much time to allow for this.



HANDY BOOK SHELF.

An Ice Mine

A glacier is an immence mass of ice which lodges between peaks in a mountain range and may be considered a valuable mine, if means are at hand to cut and transport it to cities. In Switzerland this was successfully tried a short time ago. The manner of working the deposit was much the same as the operation of quarrying out stone. Small holes were drilled in the top surface, and huge chunks then blasted out and poled through a down grade chute, a mile long, to waiting cars. The proximity of the railroad was the big factor in the success of the undertaking but considerable ingenuity was shown in the laying out of the work. Several degrees of grade were tried in the take away chute and at last it was perfected to such an extent that one man could move hundreds of tons of ice by exerting a pressure of only a few pounds on a specially made implement. As the glacier is continually growing at its uppper end and slowly working down the valley like a great river of solid ice it is an inexhaustible source of supply.

Puzzle

Write down the name of the seven objects, under which numerals appear, arrange the letters according to the order given by the numerals. For example, the first picture is a "top" and the first letter in "top" is marked "4" and is consequently the fourth in the sentence you are trying to build. The completed sentence contains twenty letters and expresses a thought suitable for boys at all times but particularly at this season of the year.

I am the captain of my soul.
Top, nail, mouse, ham, if, cat, y.

Riddles

Why does a baby walking on a broken sidewalk remind you of a musician?

Because he is a minor (A minor) and if he doesn't see sharp (C sharp) wil lsoon be flat (B flat).

Why should a besieged army prosper on a diet of sawdust?

Because it is fine board.

What should a drill master with a very rough voice do with it?

Smooth it on a file of soldiers.

Well, once more, I bid you a reluctant good by. If it were possible, I would like to have you with me in my workshop. But, my gracious, what an immense shop it would have to be. The biggest automobile factory in the world, with its 30,000 employes, would hardly be big enough to hold your lunch boxes, for, as I reckon it, there must be close to a half million COMFORT boys. Think what a clatter all the hammers would make and imagine the train loads of sawdust that would accumulate, to say nothing of chips and other rubbish; but enough, I will not think of that or may be the thought of some one's dropping a match will introude and burn up my pleasure dream. May your year be full of pleasant dreams and your dreams become realities.

UNCLE JOHN.

"Why didn't you knock at the window?" the latter demanded.

"Because Kit would have screamed!"

"But you didn't know she was here."

"I did." Maurice regarded the agonized Kit firmly. "I saw her boxes at the station."

"And never brought them!" cried Kit, ungratefully.

"I wasn't allowed to have anything to do with them. A cherry-cheeked damsel and a young man who appeared to be in the fishmonger way were just settling them on a barrow."

"A barrow! Some of them will fall off and be lost!"

Kit was still standing in the middle of the room, shoeless, with gathered-up raiment.

"How did you manage to time your visit so neatly?" inquired Nerine, subsiding into graceless ease on the hearth rug. "Did you know the old boy was going?"

"Of course. You wouldn't see me here if I didn't."

He spoke with magnificent carelessness which reached Kit's soul.

"How did you ever know? We didn't write," Nerine persisted.

Maurice grinned.

"Ask Kit. She was the last person who heard from me." He uttered this with such apparent candor that his sisters were completely deceived. "I thought I would just slip over without letting any of you know and see what you were up to. Come on, ladies, and consume jam while I take a turn at that chicken!"

Help us remove this sign!

The Off-the-Street Club, where children living in the congested districts of Chicago can congregate, is overcrowded. The three-story building with its play rooms, its reading rooms and warm firesides are closed to newcomers. More room is needed. Will you help?

Those Outside

have no yard to play in, seldom a home for comfort. The dirty, noisy, crowded street is their yard and almost their home. Many a fine mind and many a sturdy character has been ruined in these surroundings.

are given a place to play during the day and evening, finding mentally, morally and physically, healthy companions. The children are not objects of a charity, but subjects for the making of opportunities. The Off the Street Club has thus developed a fine woman out of many a girl whose future was doubtful, and has built the manhood of hundreds and hundreds of boys.

It is heart-rending to exclude newcomers. But it is better to do this than further to overcrowd those within.

25c pays the expenses every day and evening for one child for 22 days

$1.00 takes care of 3 children for a month

$2.00 takes care of 6 children for a month

$5.00 takes care of 15 children for a month

$10.00 takes care of 30 children for a month

$25.00 takes care of 75 children for a month

$100.00 takes care of 300 children for a month

Send any subscription you wish (mailing check or money order payable direct to Corn Exchange National Bank, Chicago) or send first for booklet.

The Off the Street Club in Chicago is rendering such a unique service that everybody interested in social problems should investigate. The plan will appeal especially to self-made men and to women of strength—for this is not an ordinary "charity"—it is a movement for the making of opportunities.

The Off the Street Club is incorporated in Illinois, without profit. Open to all. No creed, no race distinctions. Practically no overhead. (The superintendent gets no salary.)

The men back of this organization are the publishing and advertising interests of the country. Practically every magazine and newspaper in the United States has a representative who contributes either in time or cash—generally both—to the Off the Street Club.

Stories of the Off-the-Street Club

By Edwin Balmer, the Noted Magazine Writer

We wish to send you free a little booklet called "Stories of the Off-the-Street Club." These stories, with many side lights and interesting tales from the congested districts of a metropolis have been written by Edwin Balmer. The tales are full of the deepest human interest. And they will open your eyes to the problems of the child whose home is the street. This booklet will be sent without obligation.

The boys of the Off-the-Street Club, having themselves been helped, are taught to help others. That, and that alone, makes for character. Here is a group of boy scouts from this club, taking Xmas bundles to poor families in the neighborhood. Would you like to send some extra money for a bundle?

This Fine Touring Car Given Away!

It Is First Grand Prize In Comfort's Subscription Contest! And The One Who Wins The Car Will Be Given The Money To Run It A Whole Season!

THINK of it! If you should come out the First Prize Winner in this free-for-all contest—and your chances are just as good as anybody's—you not only get this big, beautiful, powerful 1917 Five-Passenger "Overland" but in the meantime you will have won enough money in Monthly Cash Prizes to easily pay for the expense of running it all next summer—and very likely two summers.

The man, woman, boy or girl who wins this car is absolutely sure of winning the cash also.

As explained below the Monthly Cash Prizes are entirely extra and in addition to the Auto and 61 other Grand Prizes. We are paying them to the contestants who send in the most subscriptions each month—up to and including April 1917. And as the Auto and other Grand Prizes will go to those who send in the most subscriptions during the entire six months (beginning November 1916) you will readily see why the winner of the Car—who has already won a large number of the Monthly Cash Prizes—will also have the money to pay for "gas" and other operating expenses for a long time to come.

Now is the time to make a start if you want a chance at this splendid $635 "Overland" and the other magnificent prizes named below. Remember—the Contest has been running only a few short weeks—and it is not too late for you to enter and win if you will start after your first Club today.

108 Monthly Cash Prizes And 61 Grand Prizes Besides The Auto!

This contest is open to all except our own employes, news agents or dealers and professional subscription solicitors. The Monthly Cash Prizes are awarded every month as explained further on. The 62 Grand Prizes, a list of which is given below, will be given in their order to the 62 contestants who send in the most subscriptions up to and including April 30, 1917. The $635 Overland Car will go to the one who sends in the largest number of subscriptions. The $200 in cash will go to the one who sends in the second largest number. The $150 in cash will go to the one who sends in the third largest number, and so on. Following is a list of the Grand Prizes:

First Grand Prize $635 Five-Passenger Overland Touring Car
Second Grand Prize $200 Cash
Third Grand Prize $150 Cash
Fourth Grand Prize $100 Cash
Fifth Grand Prize $75 Cash
Sixth Grand Prize $50 Cash
Seventh Grand Prize $25 Cash
Next Ten Grand Prizes each $15 Cash
Next Fifteen Grand Prizes each $10 Cash
Next Thirty Grand Prizes each $5 Cash

The Monthly Cash Prizes ranging from $180 to $2.00 a list of which follows, are awarded and paid each and every month—up to and including April 1917. They are given to the contestants who send in the most subscriptions during each month. So you see this gives you the opportunity to win one or more Monthly Cash Prizes—besides one Grand Prize—either the Auto or a Grand Cash Prize. Also notice that beginning with December the Monthly Prizes double and with January they thribble, thus giving you the opportunity to win twice and three times the amount of the original prize. In other words if you win a Monthly Cash Prize one month we pay you at once. If you win any Monthly Cash Prize the next month we will pay you double the amount of your second month's prize, and we will continue to pay double each successive month that you continue to win any Monthly Cash Prize. Doubling begins with December.

If you win the same Monthly Cash Prize three months in succession we will pay you double the amount of the prize the second month and thribble the amount the third month, and we will continue to pay you thribble the amount each successive month that you continue to win the same Monthly Cash Prize. To the contestant who wins the First Monthly Cash Prize each month for the whole six months we will pay four times the amount of that prize the fourth month, five times the amount the fifth month, and six times the amount the sixth month. Thribbling begins with January. Following is a list of the Monthly Cash Prizes. The November Cash Prizes have already been paid and the names of the winners are published elsewhere in this issue.

Nobody loses in this contest. We are going to reward every contestant for every single subscription secured—either with premiums or a cash commission. Every club you send in will entitle you to a fine premium which you may select from our regular Premium List or any issue of COMFORT. And that very same club will be placed to your credit on the Monthly Cash Prizes and the Auto and other Grand Prizes. Your premiums will be sent to you promptly upon receipt of your clubs, or, if you prefer the cash commission, deduct and retain 40 per cent. of the subscription money collected and remit us the balance. In this way we liberally reward you for all of your subscriptions as fast as you secure them. The premiums or commission alone more than pay you for your trouble and you still have the opportunity to become the owner of the splendid $685 Overland Touring Car or one of the other Grand Prizes to be awarded, at the close of the contest, April 30, 1917.

Why Not Make A Start Today?

You are sure of your premiums, and you start a Monthly Cash Prize your way besides by mailing us the subscription blank printed below along with two or more subscriptions to COMFORT. We will send your premiums as fast as you send in your clubs. Or in place of premiums you may deduct your cash commission. Remember that in entering this contest you place yourself under no obligations whatever and you forfeit nothing if you stop at any time. In other words the subscriptions sent in by you will still remain to your credit on the Monthly Cash Prizes and Grand Prizes. So you see you have everything to gain and nothing to lose. You cannot possibly lose because you get your premiums or cash commission anyway. Start a club today. Get all your friends and acquaintances to subscribe or renew their subscriptions to COMFORT. They will be glad to help you out. Then mail us your first club as soon as possible, and have your name entered in this grand contest for the $635 Overland Touring Car and other Prizes.

382 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The seven wheel chairs in December bring our total for 1916 up to 72 and make it by far the best year's showing in the history of the Wheel-Chair Club. We have beaten our 1915 record by 21, which gives me hope that we may give this splendid mercy work a still bigger boost the coming year.

The seven December chairs go to the following applicants. The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends in their behalf.

Miss Helen Daggett, Enterprise, Oregon, 202; Ona E. Catts, Paris, Ark., 171; Jesse D. Bryan, 303 Highland Ave., Winston-Salem, N. C., 135; Mallie F. B. Ferguson, Boston, Texas, 123; Wilhelmina Moore, Box 46, Vernon, Conn., 100; Mrs. Malinda Gillem, Courtois, Mo., 92; Herbert E. Walker, R. R. 1, Summerfield, N. C. 88.

Helen Daggett, age 18, had infantile paralysis ten years ago which left her crippled from her knees down. Mrs. Rosa Akers sent the entire 202 subscriptions for her, all in one club.

Little Ona Catts, age four, is another victim of infantile paralysis which has deprived her of the use of her lower limbs.

Jesse D. Bryan, age nine, crippled from birth, can not stand or walk. His mother writes that she is very desirous of the wheel chair so to take him out on the street.

Little Mallie Ferguson, age four, has been badly crippled since she had infantile paralysis two years ago and can only use her arms and hands a little. Her mother has five other children to care for.

Wilhelmina Moore, age seven, has been sick three months with infantile paralysis and has no use of her lower limbs.

Mrs. Gillem, aged 75, suffers severely from rheumatism which has made her a shut-in. She is a widow and dependent on her unmarried daughter with whom she lives.

Poor little Herbert Walker, age five, is entirely helpless, caused by spinal trouble which has been upon him from birth.

William Foster, Huntsville, Ala., In His COMFORT Wheel Chair.

These are all sad cases, but no more distressing than the needs of a hundred other applicants that are trying to earn COMFORT wheel chairs and need your help.

There is no space left for letters of thanks, but we have a fine Roll of Honor this month and the picture of William Foster seated in his COMFORT wheel chair will interest you.

Sincerely yours,
W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 200 new one-year subscriptions to COMFORT sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Subscription price is 25 cents, but if sent in clubs of five or more for the Wheel-Chair Club, I accept them at 20 cents each.

COMFORT'S Roll of Honor

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers. It was primarily started as a society for the juvenile members of COMFORT'S family, only, but those of more mature years clamored for admittance so persistently that it was deemed advisable to impose no age limit; thus all are eligible to admittance into our League provided they conform to its rules and are animated by the child spirit.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs thirty cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The thirty cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

Please observe carefully the following directions which explain exactly

How to become a Member

Send thirty cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

Or, if your subscription is already paid in advance, you can take a friend's one-year subscription at 25 cents and send it in with five cents of your own, thirty cents in all, with your request for membership, and we will send you the button and membership certificate, and send COMFORT to your friend for one year. League subscriptions do not count in premium clubs.

NEVER apply for membership without enclosing thirty cents to include a new subscription or a renewal.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth. It costs but thirty cents to join, and that gives you at least a 15-month subscription to COMFORT also, without extra cost.

Never in the world's history was so much given for so little. Never could thirty cents be invested to such advantage, and bring such splendid returns. Don't hesitate. Join us at once and induce your friends to do likewise.

All those League members who desire a list of the cousins residing in the several states, can secure the same by sending a stamped addressed envelope and five cents in stamps to Nellie Rutherford, 1299 Park Place, Brooklyn, New York grand secretary.

Special Notice

Never write a subscription or renewal order or application for membership in the body of a letter. Write your subscription or renewal and membership application on a separate sheet of paper, separate from your letter. We have to put all subscription orders on our subscription file at once; so if it is written on the same sheet as your letter, the whole letter has to go on to the subscription file at once and thus can receive no attention from Uncle Charlie.

Never send subscriptions to Uncle Charlie nor to the Secretary of the League; they bother him and cause confusion and delay.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

LONGEST TUNNEL COMPLETED.—Canada's new five-mile double track tunnel under the Selkirk Mountains has been named "Connaught Tunnel." It lowers the Canadian Pacific's mountain grade by 500 feet. It is the longest double-track tunnel in the Western Hemisphere, and was begun less than three years ago. It is a quarter of a mile longer than the Hoosac Tunnel.

A SMALLER POTATO CROP.—The estimated potato crop of the United States was about 318,000,000 bushels last year. This is hardly enough to supply the needs of the people until potatoes grow again. Unless housewives use care in making use only of what they actually need, they will have to pay excessively high prices and possibly go without them before spring.

A Few Odd Breads of The World

By Edna Mary Colman

SCATTERED over the earth are many kinds of queer breads and some of them are odd to the extreme both as to the ingredients used and the methods of preparing them.

German ingenuity has devised a bread made from sawdust, that has been pronounced as nutritious for human beings though it was intended solely for horses. For this the sawdust is first put through a process of fermentation and various other chemical transformations, after which it is mixed with one third part of rye flour, formed into loaves and baked just like any other bread. "Pain de bois," the French call it, has been declared fit for men as well as their equine friends.

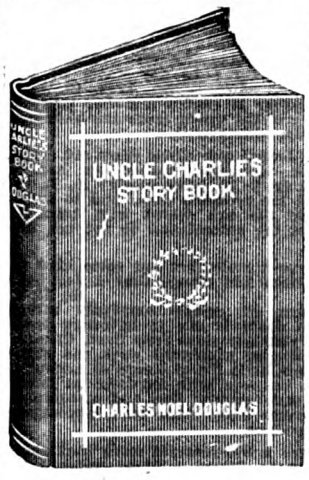
The Laplanders use the inner bark of the pine tree, which is well ground and mixed with oat flour and made into cakes which are cooked in a pan over the fire.

The Molucca Islanders use the starchy pith of the sago palm to make their little flat oblong loaves of bread which they bake in funny little cell-like ovens just large enough to hold the loaves. This pith gives a sort of a white floury meal.

Moss that grows on fir trees is converted into a bread for the Columbia River natives. After this moss is dried it is sprinkled with water, allowed to ferment, then rolled into big balls, large as a human head, and baked in pits through the use of hot stones. Freakish as this is, it is said to be not unpalatable.

In far-away Persia the natives sell their odd bread by the yard. Fancy buying a yard of bread!

It is made of the whole wheat ground up by the individual and made into a thin batter which is poured into a shallow pan and baked in hot gravel. Barring biting now and then into a bit of sand, this is a delicious bread that grows upon one. The bread man or vendor bakes it in sheets two feet to about three in length and a foot in width, while it is only about half an inch in thickness. When he is ready to start out he does not put this in a basket. He simply gathers up a pile of sheets of bread and sallies forth to sell it at about a nickel a sheet.



The California Indians collect the pollen of cat-tails in large quantities, by beating it off the plants and catching it on blankets. While this is used for making bread, their real luxury is bread made of "grasshopper flour."

The Sierra country Indians make their bread from a flour obtained from acorns. They shuck and grind a large quantity of acorn meat. A number of large bowl-like vats are dug out of the soil and into these are emptied the acorn pulp. Near by are kept clothes baskets filled with water, into which are dropped hot stones. Upon the mass of crushed acorn kernels, hot water is poured from time to time until the mass is about the color and consistency of cream. Not a speck is to be found for a squaw stands by each vat and with a small fir bough stirs the mass and removes any intruding speck that shows itself on the surface. The earth gradually absorbs the bitter waters leaving a firm white substance, which the Indians remove so quickly and skillfully that but little sticks to the soil. They spread this white substance upon the rocks to dry and afterward mix it with water, put it into thin little cakes and bake it before the fire.

Address COMFORT, Augusta Maine.

Subscribers are invited to write to this department asking for any information desired relative to the treatment of animal troubles. Questions will be answered in these columns free by an eminent veterinarian. Describe the trouble fully, sign full name and give your address; direct all correspondence to the Veterinary Department, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Should any subscriber desire an immediate, special opinion on any question privately mailed, it may be had by sending one dollar with a letter asking such advice, addressing as above.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

LUMP JAW.—On the left side of my cow's face is a large lump about the size of a person's fist. It does not seem to bother her. Any information on the above will be greatly appreciated. W. N. A.

A.—The bone tumor may be associated with the root of a diseased tooth which should be extracted or may be "lumpy jaw" (actinomycosis). If the latter you should have it cut out and the wound cauterized. If you cannot have that done paint it with tincture of iodine every other day.

GROWTHS IN TEATS.—My cow has a lump about as large around as a pea in both teats on left side. Last June she began to give bloody milk out of those two teats. Is there a cure? Is the cream fit for sale? MRS. C. A.

A.—It will be necessary to employ a skilled surgeon to remove the fibroid growths which cause the bleeding. Do not sell cream from bloody milk.

COUGH.—I have a Jersey cow three years old. Last spring she got ticks and since spring has had a hard cough. Is it likely to be tuberculosis? A. L. S.

A.—Tuberculosis is the probable cause and to make sure you should have the cow tested with tuberculin. Meanwhile isolate the animal and do not use the milk.

JACK SORES.—I have a mule that has some kind of a skin disease. It looks like mange that a dog has. G. B.

A.—This is a form of eczena commonly called "Jack sores" and no doubt is due to irritation from flies and infection of skin abrasions from dust. Cleanse each sore once and do not afterward wash the part, but once daily rub in a little bit of oleate of mercury. If flies are bad dust the sore with iodoform as found necessary. Shut the mule aginst flies and mosquitoes and spray exposed parts daily with some advertised or commercial fly repellant.

SLOBBERING.—I have a five-year-old mare that slobbers all the time she is driven. White water runs out of one nostril. C. E. K.

A.—Her teeth need attention as it is likely that milk tooth crowns (shells) of molars have lodged and should be removed by the veterinarian. For catarrh, causing discharge from the nose mix a dram of dried sulphate of iron in the feed night and morning for 10 days, then substitute a similar dose of powdered sulphate of copper for 10 days and then a like dose of iodide of potash for 10 days. Alternate these drugs for periods of 10 days until the discharge ceases. It would first be well to make sure by a veterinary examination that glanders is not present.

BLOOD IN MILK.—I have a cow that seems to be in good health. When we separate her milk, blood is left in the separator. Is there a cure? Should the milk be used? MRS. C. A.

A.—Keep a separate sample of milk from each quarter of the udder to determine which is affected. If all give bloody milk and the cow recently calved this may soon pass off but not otherwise. Very likely the blood comes from one teat in which there are growths which possibly might be removed by operation. Milk from an affected quarter should not be used.

LUMP ON ANKLE.—I have recently bought a five-year-old mule that has a lump on her right-hind leg, at the ankle joint. It is about the size of an egg and is hard. It doesn't seem to be stiff or bother her any way. I would like to know what treatment to use to reduce it. D. W. T.

A.—As the lump is doing no harm better let "well enough alone" as interference might set up irritation and do much more harm than good.

ITCHING SKIN. WORMS.—I have a fine horse four years old that has an itching skin. When he is turned out to pasture he hunts for a place to rub himself and sometimes cuts into the skin. There is no eruption and no hair comes off. The trouble seems to be along the back and rump. (2) My horses have pin worms. They have an unusual appetite, craving strange things to eat. MRS. W. B.

A.—Have the horse clipped and then wash itching places with a 1-100 solution of coal tar dip thickened with flowers of sulphur and repeat the applications as often as found necessary. Make it impossible for chicken lice to cause the irritation. (2) Pin worms inhabit the rectum and have to be destroyed by rectal injections of soapy warm water containing a cupful of tobacco decoction or tea to the one half gallon. Give them on three consecutive nights in one week. Also give the worm powders often prescribed here.

PARTIAL PARALYSIS.—I have a sow six months old that is losing the use of her hind legs. She has been fed on skim-milk all her life. When she lies on her side she makes a noise in breathing. Will she make good pork if I fatten her? MRS. D. P.

A.—Rickets commonly is present in such cases and after a time the sow will be likely to go down paralyzed. Stuffing hogs on corn and keeping them confined induces the trouble in a majority of instances. Allow her free range and fatten her for slaughter. The meat will be all right for use provided no serious disease, such as tuberculosis is found present.

RINGWORMS.—I have a Jersey cow that has hard circles under her skin on the hip and shoulder. The center of the circle is slightly raised, very hard, and feels like a scab under the skin. Please give a remedy. MRS. N. S. R.

A.—Scrub each spot clean and then rub in some iodine ointment daily. If this does not prove quickly effective cleanse again and paint once daily with tincture of iodine.

COUGH.—I have a calf seven months old that coughs as a horse does that has distemper. His throat is swollen, but doesn't appear to be sick. H. H.

A.—Once daily rub the throat from ear to ear with a mixture of one tablespoonful of turpentine in half a cup of melted lard. Twice daily give a tablespoonful of glyco-heroin and increase the dose if found necessary. This will help if the cough is not due to lung worms.

STOCKED LEGS.—I have a horse eighteen years old and a good worker. What I feed him does not do him any good. I feed on oats, corn and stock peas. J. M. C.

A.—The horse has indigestion. Have his teeth put in order by a veterinarian then feed from a very large box to prevent bolting of feed. Add wheat bran to the oats, also some old hard peas to encourage him to chew the oats. Allow him a box stall in the stable and each time he comes in hand rub his legs and then bandage snugly with flannel from feet to knees and hocks. Work or exercise the horse every day. Keep the bowels active. Do not give drugs of any kind.

LUMP ON LEG.—Can you tell me what to do for my two-year-old heifer? She has a lump about the size of a goose egg on her leg just above her knee. When she was a few hours old she run through a barb wire fence and scratched herself above the knee. As she grows older the lump gets larger. MRS. R. LAF.

A.—Do not cut the part. Clip off the hair and swab the lump with tincture of iodine once daily. Stop for a time if the skin becomes sore. After calving the lump may be opened if that appears necessary.

HEAVES.—Please give remedy for heaves, if there is any. E. O. R.

A.—As often advised here feed grass in summer and wet oat straw or bundles in winter instead of hay. Do not give any bulky feed at noon if the horse has to work and do not work him soon after a meal. Keep the bowels active by feeding carrots, bran or silage. Night and morning give one tablespoonful (half an ounce) of Fowler's solution of arsenic until no longer needed, then gradually discontinue the medicine taking a week or more to the work. This treatment will relieve distress but heaves is incurable when established.

The Goddess of Lonesome Ranch

By Hapsburg Liebe

Copyright, 1916, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

BILL SELFORD, cowman and ranch-owner, was in love with a picture; it was on a six-year-old calendar, and it was the picture of a young woman and a blonde. It is not so strange. That pictured face was the only blonde face Bill Selford had seen for five years, and Bill Selford was a young and stalwart and thoroughly natural specimen of the genus homo. He did not like brunettes; the Mexican girls and the half-caste girls and even the full-blooded Spanish girls, from across the border had but caused him to love the picture more. That blonde face had come to mean to Bill Selford all that was good and sweet and beautiful in womankind. It was not too serious, and not too gay; it seemed sympathetic behind its winsome smile, and sometimes it seemed a little mischievous and a little saucy too. The original, the owner of Lonesome Ranch had told himself hundreds of times, was a woman one might depend upon to get him something good to eat and know just where to find his house shoes, a woman who would bear a good man's name well.

Bill Selford stood before the picture now. It hung above his scarred desk, in the front room of his plain but comfortable ranch house. His broad-rimmed Stetson was off, as though in reverence to his paper goddess; his coal-black hair was rumpled and damp, at the temples, with perspiration, for the Texas day was warm. Always before he had eyed her wistfully, as one looks at some coveted thing that is hopelessly out of one's reach; but now he regarded her determinedly, somehow triumphantly, with his smooth, tanned cheeks pink toward their centers and his hazel-brown eyes unwontedly bright.

"I may not find you, myself," he said aloud, dropping to his desk a check for thirty thousand dollars, on which the ink was hardly dry; "but I'll find one o' your type, all right; I'll find one so near like you that I won't notice the difference!"

He drawled it in the musical drawl of the native Tennessean. Long years in the solitudes of the Southwest had taught him to talk to himself. He went on, in the same low tone:

"You look sassy—sassier than you've ever looked before! But that don't make no difference, honey. Not a particle. When I find you, I'll marry you. If I have to carry you off like a cave man, I'll marry you. I've got lots o' money now, and we'll have a planner, and heaps o' nice things and dishes in the house. You can have anything you want, honey, unless it's a poodle dawg. I could stand for a Gila monster, or a di'mo..d-back rattler, or a Tasmanian devil for a pet; but I couldn't stand for no poodle dawg!"

The sound of smothered laughing fell upon his ears; then the laughter reached a loud and unrestrained guffaw. Selford turned quickly and beheld, standing in the doorway, a tall, lean, tanned, youngish but bearded fellow in characteristic Western attire. It was "Pokerface" Allen, once more or less notorious as an artist in the old game of holdup.

"You—Pokerface!" Selford grinned sheepishly. "How long you been standin' there listenin' to my somnambulism?"

The newcomer's countenance suddenly became as blank as a board, and therein lies the secret of his nickname.

"Oh, 'bout an hour——"

"Nothin' like it!" Selford broke in.

Pokerface Allen drew his brows and jerked up his shoulders. "Oh, well!" he exclaimed—"let that pass. Say, do you mind tellin' me who was the big old skeezicks who just left here in the new buck?"

"Oil man from El Paso," Selford answered. "I sold him forty acres off o' the north end o' my ranch for thirty thousand. It was my oil prospect, you know. And now," with a grin, "I'm goin' to some big town and have a big time——"

"And look up the original o' that there paper goddess," interrupted Pokerface Allen. "And I'm goin' with you. I couldn't let my old side-kicker go off alone into the cruel world! I ain't got the money to pay my way, and I ain't goin' to sponge off o' you, so I'll go as your valet."

"My valet!" echoed the ranchman.

"Yes," said Allen, blandly. "You'll go in swell style, when you go out to make your social de*but* and look for a skirts, so you'll have to have a valet. I'll shave off all o' my hair but a pair o' good, long peninsulars, and I'll talk Englishly, and you'll address me as 'Harmsworth.' See? Believe me, I know how to do it. I've read mountains o' books about high life in England. Listen to me talk a little, as your man 'Harmsworth'——

"Hi s'y, Mister William, and 'ow are you this morning, sir?" without a change of countenance save for a twinkle in his clear gray eyes.

Selford was thoughtful. He much regretted to refuse to employ Allen as a valet. He liked the homeless man; Allen had lightened many heavy and lonesome hours for him, and several times Allen had rendered valuable service when Mexican cattle-rustlers came to Lonesome Ranch.

Pokerface fingered his young beard. "Look here, Bill," with great earnestness. "You're the only friend I've got on earth. I've done quit the gamble and the holdup, but it's hard—you know it is, Bill—to live down a bad name. I want to go with you, honest. I'll go for bare my expenses. You'll be lonesomer than ever without somebody you know."

Selford reconsidered. If he went in style, he would have to have a valet. Perhaps Allen would do as well as anyone else, since Allen knew so much about high life in England.

"All right, Harmsworth," he agreed. "You'll find a razor in there," pointing. "You can wear some of my clothes until we get to New Orleans, and then we'll outfit complete in some real glad stuff."

Two minutes later, Pokerface Allen was strapping a razor and singing:

> "I'm a goin' to live, anyhow, 'til I die—
> I'm a goin' to live, anyhow, 'til I die!
> Anyhow, anyhow, 'til I die—
> Anyhow, 'til I die!"

Which meant that, whatever happened, he would live until he died.

* * * * * * * * * * * *

Mr. William Selford and his valet reached New Orleans the day after Christmas. They had barely finished fitting themselves out in fine new clothing, which included broad-rimmed and dove-colored Stetson hats, when Selford caught sight of a young woman who very much resembled the paper goddess of Lonesome Ranch. She was on the street, and a big and florid elderly man was with her. Selford and his valet followed the couple to the railway station, where the elderly man bought two fares to Lesterville, which is a winter resort on the Gulf coast.

"Yankees, I'd say," muttered Pokerface, thoughtfully stroking his smoothly shaven chin.

"Southerners, is my bet," replied Selford—"look at that!"

Allen was already looking. He saw a dark, low-browed man in black accost the girl's father angrily; he saw the old fellow stare resentfully, turn, take his daughter by the arm and go with her toward the waiting train. The dark, low-browed man clenched his fists and jerked the corners of his mouth down savagely.

"Enter the sleek and oily villain!" grinned Pokerface.

"Correct—the first guess!" agreed Selford. "I never read of a villain that could outshine him. Pointed black mustache, bull neck—by cripes, if he ain't buyin' a ticket to Lesterville too! I guess we'd better go to Lesterville, hadn't we?"

"Sure. We'll wire back for our baggage—I mean our luggage."

So they went to Lesterville and wired back for their luggage.

Lesterville on the Gulf coast is only a village. There are two or three old business houses, a few old dwellings, a dozen cottages owned by wealthy Northerners, and a big, wooden hotel which sets in a grove of palms. The hotel's grounds run down to the bay, and there is a wharf for motor launches. Selford and Allen went to The Palms, and there demanded the best rooms available; they got them and paid for them in advance. Then they began to lay a plan by which they hoped to make a big impression on the couple they had followed from New Orleans.

And this is how it worked:

After breakfast the next morning, Selford ambled out to the broad front veranda and sat down not far from his heart's desire and her father. He paid no attention to them. A moment later, Allen walked up with a newspaper.

"'Ere is the morning paper, Mister William, sir," he said, bowing pompously. "And 'ow are you this morning, sir? Hi trust you like the haccommodations 'ere better than in New Horleans, sir?"

"Pretty fair, Harmsworth, pretty fair," Selford growled. "Oh, by the way, Harmsworth, you might buy us a couple of good horses, also wire Bellew to have the big car overhauled and shipped as soon as possible. I think I'll like this place. It's very quiet, you know."

"Yes, sir, Mister William," and Allen bowed, his countenance as blank as a board, and turned away.

Fate has a fashion of helping or hindering the plans of us poor little mortals at her will—or caprice. Fate stepped in now. The villainous-looking, low-browed bull-necked man appeared on the veranda; he walked hurriedly up to the girl's father, and said a few words in an angry tone. The old man and his daughter rose. The low-browed man drew back to strike. Selford sprang and seized his uplifted arm.

"No fighting before a lady," Selford growled menacingly. "You better clear out."

"What's it to you?" demanded the dark man. "What you got to do with it, anyway? I——"

Selford propelled him to the veranda steps and pushed him to the lawn.

"And if you come back here any more, I'll thrash you!" he promised.

The dark man went away grumbling, and Selford returned to the couple.

"I hope you wasn't badly scared," he said to the girl.

"Not very badly," she answered, smiling in a way that reminded the Westerner of the picture on the six-year-old calendar at Lonesome Ranch.

"The fellow worked for me and we had a falling out," said the girl's father. "I assure you I am obliged to you for your kindly and timely interference, sir. A fellow can't do much fighting when he is fifty. My name is Ward, sir—C. C. C. Ward, the broker—and this is my daughter, Beatrice."

After the introductions, the two men sat down and began to talk business. Ward was interested in copper. Selford said his line was oil. Oil was going a little slow. Copper was booming. Beatrice left them, as though she disliked business and went down through the grounds toward the bay shore. A minute later, Selford followed her. He spent the remainder of the morning with her, and he fell in love with her deeply.

"She's a throughbred," he told Pokerface Allen that afternoon. "No love makin' wouldn't go. She wouldn't stand for no slush, mush, gush nor no such stuff. Say, Pokerface, I'm goin' to take a flier in copper, a heavy flier. I'm goin' to make, or lose, a big bunch o' money."

A few weeks passed. They were not altogether without incident. Bill Selford had come to love Beatrice Ward so much that he dreamed of her every time he slept, and Bill Selford had lost all his money in copper. The——

Pokerface Allen went to his master early one morning, and said, in a low and excited tone:

"Simpson Caudle held up old C. C. C. Ward last night, took his watch and his money, and beat him considerable. It was after you'd went to bed. The police got Caudle, and locked him up, and I——" this in a whisper—"pried some bars loose and set him free!"

Simpson Caudle was the dark, low-browed, bull-necked man with the pointed black mustache.

"You set him free!" Selford exclaimed, unbelievingly. "Why did you do that, Pokerface?"

TO BE CONCLUDED IN FEBRUARY.

Blinded by his idolizing love of Beatrice, Selford can not see that it is her father who has swindled him out of a fortune and he is still an easy mark for Ward's further schemes. To this fine tangle of Selford's love and business affairs Pokerface butts in, without his master's knowledge, and proceeds to fight the devil with his own weapons. Pokerface's desperate expedient and its remarkable outcome make a thrilling conclusion of this interesting story. Renew your subscription today so to make sure not to miss it in February COMFORT.

Comfort's Comicalities "Jest for Fun"

A Prospect of Freedom

"Where do you intend to go this summer?"

"I'm going to stay at home," replied Mr. Dustin Stax. "My family's going away and I'm going to embrace the opportunity to sit in my shirt-sleeves and smoke cigars in the best rooms in the house."—Washington Star.

Keeping It Quiet

Little Margaret lived in a gossipy neighborhood and, being an observant child, she had got some ideas into her curly head. One day, having done something naughty, she was sent up-stairs to confess her transgression in prayer.

"Did you tell God all about it?" asked her mother when she came down again.

Margaret shook her head decidedly.

"'Deed I didn't," she declared. "Why, it would have been all over heaven in no time."—Boston Transcript.

Difference in Religion

The woolly-headed Uncle Rasmus was accused of disturbing the peace. Officer Mort Rudolph explained it as follows:

"Your honor, this man was running up and down the Mill River road waving his arms and yelling at the top of his voice, and otherwise raising the mischief, at half past one in the morning. The people of the district complained, and they had a perfect right to."

The Judge, says Case and Comment, frowned at Rasmus, who didn't seem to be particularly worried.

"What do you mean by such unbecoming conduct?" his honor demanded.

"Religion, Jedge," was the response.

"Religion! Are you a Holy Roller or something like that? I have religion, Rasmus, but I don't get up at midnight and tell everybody about it."

"Dat's des' de diffunce, Jedge. I ain't ershamed ob mine."

A Good Horse

Old Mr. Casewell was an inveterate horse trader, and also a good deal of a wag.

One day he swapped a decidedly disreputable looking nag, and after the deal was consummated he said:

"Now, sir, I'll tell yer fair and square. That horse has got two faults."

"Yes, and more too, I guess," assented the other. "But what are the two you mention?"

"Well," confided old Casewell, slowly, "If he gets out in th' field he's th' hardest horse to ketch ye ever see, an' when ye ketch him he ain't worth a cuss."—National Magazine.

Choosing the Lesser

"We sleep under double blankets every night out where I live."

"It must be delightfully cool out there."

"Cool? Who said anything about it being cool? It's hotter than blazes; but we need the blankets to keep the mosquitoes out."

So He Didn't Waste It

A little boy went to Sunday school for the first time. His mother gave him a nickel to put in the collection box. When he returned he had a sack of candy.

"Where did you get the candy?" asked his mother.

"From the stand around the corner."

"But what did you buy it with?"

"With the nickel you gave me."

"But that was for Sunday school."

"Well," replied the boy, "I didn't need it. The minister met me at the door and got me in free."—Christian Herald.

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

Look for the First Symptoms of Pellagra in Spring and See to Your Diet

SAD to relate, that terrible scourge, pellagra, is still raging in certain sections of this country, although it is wholly and absolutely preventable, as has been proved beyond doubt by the investigations and tests made by the U. S. Public Health Service in conjunction with the Health Departments of certain States. Eight thousand people died of pellagra in the United States during the year 1915 besides the many thousands of sufferers from this disease who are dragging out a miserable existence and slowly sinking to fill an untimely grave—all needlessly.

Although we have twice before explained what causes, and how to prevent and cure pellagra, we are still receiving from our readers many requests for a remedy for this disease; therefore we are again giving space to this subject in the hope that the information given here may be the means of saving life and of restoring the health of many who are afflicted as well as contributing to prevent the spread of this malady, which can be nipped in the bud if these directions are faithfully followed.

First let it be understood that drugs and medicines are of no value in the treatment of pellagra; also that it is not a contagious disease.

The cause of pellagra is lack of proper nourishment resulting from an improper diet. Now this does not mean insufficient food or unwholesome food. You may eat an abundance of wholesome food but if your diet as a whole lacks certain necessary elements of nutriment you are likely to develop pellagra. The agricultural writers are teaching the farmers the importance of a "balanced ration" in the feeding of cattle, hogs and poultry and it is pretty thoroughly understood that these animals will not thrive unless they have a mixed diet containing the various necessary kinds of nutrients in about the right proportions.

The same rule applies in the feeding of human beings. They require a properly balanced ration and if they do not have it for any great length of time they get sick.

Foods are divided into two principal classes. One comprises the heat and energy producers such as sugar, starch and fats, and they include corn, potatoes, certain other vegetables, oils and fats and various forms of sugar; these serve as fuel, producing the animal heat, and are necessary as such, but they are not muscle builders and do not repair the waste and wear and tear of the body. The other class comprises the nitrogenous or proteid foods, as they are called, which are muscle builders and flesh producers and repair the wear and waste of the body, and they include lean meat, fish, eggs, milk, cheese, beans and peas. This explains why both these classes of food are necessary to health, and the lack of either causes trouble. Clover and alfalfa are rich in protein and are excellent nitrogenous foods for animals but human stomachs cannot digest them. The cow will turn alfalfa into milk, the hen into eggs, the growing pig into flesh and bone and when he is grown you feed him corn and he makes that into fat.

Pellagra is caused by a diet which consists mainly of starchy foods and lacks sufficient nitrogenous food. Pellagra is prevalent in southern Italy and in certain sections of our Southern States where the people live largely on corn. For this reason it was at first erroneously supposed that eating corn induced pellagra. Corn is wholesome but, being a starchy food, it is not a complete ration and needs a nitrogenous food such as fresh meat, eggs, or milk to go with it to make a balanced ration. No part of the country is exempt from this disease.

Many of our Southern farmers live too largely on corn, sweet potatoes and bacon and the consequence is pellagra. They should keep at least one good cow for each family and a good-sized flock of hens, and should raise enough peas and beans to last them through the year. With their tables abundantly supplied through the year with milk, eggs, poultry and dried peas and beans cooked in various ways to go with fruits and other vegetables there would be no more pellagra in the rural sections of this country. Where cows do not thrive, as in certain parts of Florida, condensed milk, as nourishing as the fresh article, can be bought at a moderate price.

A bulletin issued by the U. S. Public Health Service warns that, although the outbreak of pellagra in most cases does not appear until June or July, the condition invariably dates from a faulty diet of earlier months, and therefore urges the need of exercising due precautions through the winter and spring. This does not mean that the diet can safely be neglected at other seasons but rather that special care should be taken in early spring and a close watch kept for the first danger signals such as extreme nervousness, change of mental characteristics, weakness, debility, disinclination to undertake the ordinary daily work, or unaccountable digestive disturbance, likely to occur in the spring as premonitory signs of incipient pellagra. These symptoms do not necessarily mean the development of pellagra, but if they occur in connection with a one-sided, monotonous diet they serve as a definite warning of its possible onset which, even then, may be warded off in most cases by immediate change to a properly varied and balanced diet.

As a spring diet for those threatened with pellagra the bulletin recommends: for breakfast, oranges or grapefruit, oatmeal mush and cream (milk will do), without sugar, with ham or breakfast bacon and two eggs and not more than two slices of whole wheat bread and butter, and a glass of milk; for dinner, soup made from dried peas or beans with soup stock, also fresh meat of some kind and boiled or baked potatoes, some seasonable vegetable and lettuce, and for desert some stewed fruit, fresh or dried; with the dinner a glass of buttermilk (sour milk will answer) and not more than two slices of whole wheat bread and butter; for supper, pork and beans or baked beans. It is desirable to vary this diet from day to day in order to keep up the appetite, and for this purpose eggs cooked in various ways, or fish may be substituted occasionally for the meat.

Do not expect that a week or ten days of this diet will cure pellagra, but if you keep to it persistently and continuously it will surely protect you from the developement of the disease. The bulletin also explains that this particular bill of fare need not be rigidly adhered to. It is given as a sample or standard of a mixed diet containing the two classes of food in the proper relative proportions. It may be varied according to circumstances by using the fruits and vegetables in season at different times of year, but the main point is to avoid excessive use of starchy and sweet foods, and to be sure to eat a plenty of fresh meat, fish, eggs, milk, cheese, beans and peas. At present high prices an anti-pellagra diet may be somewhat of a problem for the small wage earner in the city but, as everything necessary for the prevention and cure of this disease can be grown on the farm, if the farmer suffers from this affliction it is his own fault.

Mighty Significance of Recent Purchase of Danish West Indies by U. S.

UNCLE Sam is still extending his dominions. His latest, though very small, is a very important expansion consisting of the annexation of the group of three little islands, Saint Thomas, Saint Croix and Saint John, which constitute the Danish West Indies. We have just bought them of Denmark for twenty-five million dollars, which seems a pretty steep price; but they are worth it to us because of their strategic importance to our plan of national defense although, as a holding proposition, they were worse than valueless to Denmark.

The entire area of these islands is only 138 square miles, about the size of four townships, and their total population numbers 33,000, mostly negroes employed on the sugar plantations. They have little value commercially, and as the maintenance of their government was a continual bill of expense to Denmark she has wanted for the last fifty years to dispose of them.

Because of their commanding position at the entrance of the Caribbean Sea, 50 miles east of Porto Rico, 1,200 from Panama and 1,600 from New York, they would be a menace to our commerce, our out-lying territorial possessions and our national safety if they passed into the control of one of the great European powers which have cast longing eyes on them for the establishment of a naval station at the spacious harbor of Saint Thomas which is perfectly adapted to the purpose. But with this harbor fortified and equipped as a base of operations for our navy the defense of our coast, of our interests in the West Indies and of the Panama Canal will be immensely facilitated and strengthened.

We are responsible for the protection of Cuba, Hayti and San Domingo; the rich island of Porto Rico with 1,200,000 inhabitants is ours and we own the Panama Canal worth $500,000,000 or more. Therefore these little Danish Islands are well worth the price to us because of their inestimable strategic importance. Our only mistake is that we did not buy them long ago when they were offered to us at one fifth the price. General Grant, with keen foresight of the destined growth of the United States to the magnitude of a world power, appreciated the necessity of our owning these islands and, when President, negotiated a treaty whereby Denmark agreed to let us have them for $5,000,000, but the trade fell through because Congress refused to pay the price. President Roosevelt made another effort to buy them, but the price had gone up; the conditions which President Grant foresaw as making them necessary to our safety had arrived and at the same time a great European power was intriguing to obtain possession of them. It is probable that we should have had trouble over the present trade if Europe was not engaged in war.

The Secretary of the Navy is arranging for a grand naval demonstration at Saint Thomas to add to the dignity of the ceremony of taking over these islands which are to be a stronghold for the defense not only of the United States but of all North, Central and South America under the protecting shield of the Monroe Doctrine which we are bound to maintain.

Another Temperance Victory

THE bill to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia has been given a passage by the U. S. Senate and if, as is confidently predicted, it meets with like favorable action in the House of Representatives, Washington will be dry after the last day of next October. Years ago the grog ration was abolished in the navy, later malt liquors were banished from the army canteen and recently our naval officers were forbidden the privilege of keeping liquors for their personal use, but to the disgrace of the country Congress still encourages the liquor traffic by licensing it in the national capital and in the territories. There is a bill before Congress to prohibit liquor selling in Alaska and another to make Hawaii dry. If, as is hoped, these three temperance measures are adopted by the present Congress it will give a strong impetus to the movement for nation-wide prohibition.

WITH the passing of the one hundred and eighteen years since death claimed the beloved Washington, historians, biographers, orators, preachers, poets, artists and prose writers have been ceaselessly and diligently plying the torch of investigation into the life of this great man until it would seem as though every act of his waking hours from infancy to the grave had been held up to the public gaze, and every tiny circumstance in his eventful career, analyzed and recounted until each incident had become common legend in every household. So also it would seem as though every trinket, letter, bit of furniture, military accoutrement, and intimate personal belonging had been described, and displayed until all of his possessions must verily be as familiar to the average American as his pictured features.

Yet there exists today a unique collection of articles, so carefully treasured and so thoroughly secluded that only a small proportion of the people of the land are aware of its existence. These articles are valued far above the power of wealth to borrow or purchase and are the property of the fraternity whose devotion to Washington has a different meaning from that of the popular homage of the public, and this devotion is soon to have expression in the erection of a magnificent memorial temple in Alexandria, Va., the town that knew him best as a church goer and as a Mason. Here too, is to be found the only portrait of Washington in existence that is an actual reproduction of his own features and not an artist's idealized conception of what the Father of His Country should look like on canvas. This is also absolutely the only portrait made of Washington as an old man. This famous Williams' painting, now of fabulous value, with many other priceless mementoes, because of their association with the Nation's first president, is the property of the Alexandria-Washington Lodge, No. 22 A. F. and A. M. at Alexandria, Va. They line the historic walls of the council chamber whose very atmosphere seems impregnated with the stately dignity of the great soldier and craftsman. For Lodge No. 22 boasts the proud distinction of having had George Washington for its first or charter master, which office he held in 1783, and after being elected to succeed himself served in all about twenty months.

In 1793, the lodge by resolution requested the General, then President and residing in Philadelphia, to sit for his portrait. After his consent had been obtained with Mrs. Washington's aid, the artist, William Williams, of that city was commissioned to do the work. This man had been a resident of Georgetown, D. C. and was presented to President Washington by Gen. Henry Lee (Light Horse Harry Lee), who was then the Representative from that district, by request of the lodge. The artist through the influence of the fraternity and General Lee, secured in all about thirteen sittings, most of which were given under more or less protest as the famous President did not relish the idea of deliberately posing.

After a year of work the painting was completed and accepted by Washington as a good, true likeness of himself. Then it was closely scrutinized by the committee of Masons, all of them lifelong friends and associates of the first President. After mature deliberation they attested to their satisfaction and then the most critical of all judges, the family, were called in to give the final proof of the quality of the likeness by their opinion, and when they too approved of the artist's handiwork, the portrait was formally accepted and framed and hung in the place of honor in the Masonic council chamber where it has been so jealously guarded all of these years.

The Williams' picture is an entirely different conception from all other portraits of Washington and without question the most faithful reproduction of his living features. It has the double distinction of being the only portrait ever made of him in the Masonic regalia and in old age. In cast and feature it is a little like the Houdon statue in Richmond, Va. It is a flesh colored pastelle which critics pronounce of most superior quality and for which the artist received from the Lodge about three hundred dollars. From time to time fabulous sums have been offered for it by art collectors, museums and even the United States Government has made a bid for it. Though it is now valued above $100,000, its Masonic character, and the sentiment of past association preclude the possibility of its ever being sold.

Despite his majestic stature and imposing manner, Washington was not handsome of feature and that portraiture has failed to show later generations his real likeness is the general opinion of writers who studied this remarkable man after he became the Nation's Chief. They contend that his habitual expression was one that no painter had ever been able to get. He is said to have admitted that he was asleep part of the time he posed for Peale, and while Gilbert Stuart was painting the most famous of his portraits, the one that is the best known and which appears on all literature, records, souvenirs, etc., Washington sat in manifest discomfort with his lips padded with cotton to hide the defects of his mouth and jaws due to a badly fitting set of false teeth. Stuart, in his writings, openly commented upon the defects of feature which his art had concealed. To still further mar his physiognomy, Washington contracted the smallpox when a youth of nineteen and carried the disfiguring pock marks to his death. His whole make up was of generous proportions and his features large and somewhat inclined to be coarse. Stuart says that his eye sockets were the largest he ever saw and the upper part of his nose the most broad.

WASHINGTON'S BED-CHAMBER CLOCK WHICH STILL POINTS TO THE HOUR AND MINUTE OF ITS OWNER'S DEATH.

Though the walls of this historic hall are liberally endowed with portraits of distinguished people, there is one other that merits the deferential attention of the visitor, because of the identity of the original and his many years of loyalty to the best interests of the young surveyor whose first important undertaking was the surveying of his vast estate. This was the wealthy and the mighty Lord Fairfax, who owned 5,500,000 acres of Virginia land which young Washington helped to subdivide. As a portrait alone, this is worthy of distinction as it is the famous Sir Joshua Reynolds' painting of Thomas, sixth Lord Fairfax, Baron of Cameron, the one man to whom more than any one else Washington owed his success in life, since from early boyhood until his death in 1781 Lord Fairfax was his patron and never failing friend. This wonderful old painting of one of the founders of the city of Alexandria, the only one of the famous baron in existence, is given even higher valuation than the Williams' portrait by the art critics.

But it is not in portraits alone that the lodge is so rich for there are other relics of Washington's public and private life, and here and there may be seen articles closely interwoven with the history of our nation. One of them, that which claims precedence in attention and before which even the most indifferent observer must pause in reverential awe, is the quaint little bed-chamber clock that told off the hours that marked the opening and the fulfillment of each day's schedule of duties and pastimes of the Master of the Mansion House of Mt. Vernon. It also kept toll as the sands of time counted off the last moments in the life of the great patriot and its silent hands still point to the hour and minute when the "greatest life in history" fulfilled its mortal span.

ORIGINAL LODGE ROOM, SHOWING WILLIAMS' PAINTING, ORIGINAL FURNITURE, LESSER LIGHTS, OLD ALTAR AND MASTER'S CHAIR OWNED AND USED BY WASHINGTON WHEN MASTER.

On the death of the General, Dr. Elisha Dick, one of the attending physicians and a lifetime friend, cut the weight cord and stopped the faithful old timepiece when the spirit took its flight at twenty minutes past ten P. M., December 14, 1799. Later on Mrs. Washington gave the clock to Dr. Dick for the Lodge, and for nearly one hundred and eighteen years, this little clock with the detached weight standing beside it has kept silent memorial vigil. As it happens, it is the only bit of furniture in existence that belonged to the bedroom at that time, which has not not since been restored to the Mt. Vernon mansion.

By it also stand the Lesser Lights, original lights of the Lodge, which played a part in the ceremonies attendant upon the laying of the corner stones of the District of Columbia in 1791, the National Capitol in 1793, the funeral of General Washington in 1799 and the laying of the corner stone of the Washington Monument in 1848. Another aged and highly prized relic of national importance that still participates both in the great national events of note and also in the annual fraternal memorial exercises of this venerable association, is the tiny silver trowel with the ivory handle used by General Washington, then President of the United States, when laying the corner stone of the Capitol in 1793, on September 18. This important epoch making ceremony in American history, also marked an epoch in American Masonry as it was conducted by the Grand Lodge of Maryland which then and until 1811 held jurisdiction over the tract of land set apart as the District of Columbia, Right Worshipful Joseph Clarke, Grand Marshal protem, officiating. When the procession marched to the site selected for the corner stone, President Washington, with Doctor Elisha Dick on his right and the Grand Master pro tem on his left, marched behind his own lodge, No. "22" which served as an escort of honor to him. On arriving at the site(the column in front inclined two steps, one to the right and one to the left, and faced each other, forming a hollow, oblong square, through which the procession filed in reversed order. The President, the Grand Master pro tem, and the Worshipful Master of "22" taking their stand to the east of a large stone and all of the craft forming a circle westward, stood for a short time in solemn order. The Grand Marshal presented to the Commissioners a silver plate appropriately inscribed, which was read and delivered to Washington, who with the Grand Master pro tem, and the three Worshipful Masters descended to cavazion trench and laid it on the corner stone of the National Capitol of the United States. This trowel was made by a silversmith, John Duffey, and one of the most important of its latest services was when it was used by President Roosevelt to lay the corner stone of the new Masonic Temple of the District of Columbia.

The huge chair which stands in a glass case in the lodge room, shows evidence of age and hard usage. It was originally the property of Washington at Mt. Vernon and when he was worshipful master of No. 22, he had it brought to the lodge for his own personal use. After all of these years and years of hard service, and continuous use in the hall the splendid old piece began to show signs of age. It has a frame of mahogany inlaid with white holly, and upholstered in leather of so sturdy a quality that it neither split nor ripped until the soulless curio seeking vandal came along to cut and slash it. Then it was incased in glass and brought forth only on Washington's birthday. During its lifetime of activity it has held many distinguished men, among whom may be numbered General Lafayette during his visit to this country in 1825. Among others who have shared this honor are Admiral Schley, Fairbanks when Vice President, President Taft and Speaker Cannon. This time-honored chair is not the only relic brought forth to participate in the Masonic Ceremonial each year. The Masonic apron owned and worn by Washington when Master and at the ceremony of laying the corner stone of the Capitol was the gift of General Lafayette, and what further enhances the value of the apron is the fact that it is the handiwork of the French General's talented wife. On this Madame de Lafayette surely lavished her taste for it is still a gorgeous affair. It was of cream-colored satin heavily fringed and richly embroidered in gold with the French and American Flags entwined, their colors still retaining a remnant of their original brilliance. In the center may be seen a beehive and a group of fairies. This emblem was sent to General Washington with the handsome sash in a pearl inlaid ebony box with which it was presented to the Lodge in 1812 by Lawrence Lewis, nephew of Washington and husband of his adopted daughter, Nellie Custis. Only the most notable occasions have called the apron into use since the death of the man for whom it was made, but it and everything else pertaining to Washington was brought forth during Lafayette's visit when he was the guest of the lodge.

A simple, shallow, wall cabinet secluding what appears to be but insignificant trifles is teeming with interest. The romance, comedy and tragedy in the life history of this unusual man are linked

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Edith Allandale, the only support of an invalid mother pawns a valuable watch. To redeem it she offers a five-dollar gold piece, paid to her by Royal Bryant, to the broker, who, dropping it into the drawer declares it a counterfeit and returns it. Going home her mother suggests it may be genuine and again Edith goes out to buy food and coal. While eating supper an officer enters, followed by the grocer who insists upon Edith's arrest for passing counterfeit money. She is hurried to the station house, leaving her mother in the care of Kate O'Brien. Edith writes to Royal Bryant explaining the situation. He redeems the watch, secures Edith's release and sends her home, where she finds her mother dying. After her death in reading letters, Edith learns she is an adopted daughter, the child of a dear friend, who believes she is legally a wife, until the father of her child admits his perfidy and deserts her. Edith writes Mr. Bryant, giving no address and goes to Boston, securing a position as companion with Mrs. Gerald Goddard. Edith discovers there is a skeleton in the family, when Mrs. Goddard accuses her of attempting to steal her husband's affections. Emil Correlli, Mrs. Goddard's brother is persistent in his attentions to Edith; she tries to avoid him and decides to leave. Mrs. Goddard begs her to stay. Edith, going to walk renders assistance to Mrs. Stewart, who is attracted to her and shows agitation when she learns she is a companion to Mrs. Goddard, and if she needs a friend to come to her. Edith is overtaken by Emil Correlli. Nearing Mrs. Goddard's house, a woman, unknown to Edith addresses Emil in a foreign tongue. Realizing that Edith thinks there is something mysterious in his relation to this woman he endeavors to set it right, renews his protestations of love, offers marriage and is staggered by her refusal. Mrs. Goddard unfolds a scheme which cannot fail to make Edith Allen his wife, but Emil must go away. Mrs. Goddard plans with Edith for a "mid-winter frolic," at their country home. The housekeeper, Mrs. Weld, overhears Mr. Goddard entreating his wife for a certain document. Mrs. Goddard proposes a theatrical performance entitled "The Masked Bridal." The guests arrive. Mrs. Weld takes a folded paper from Mrs. Goddard's jewel case; it vindicates her. Mrs. Goddard, having sent for Edith and seeing Mr. Weld in an adjoining room devises a scheme to get her from meeting Edith.

CHAPTER XII.

THE MASKED BRIDAL.

"OH, Mrs. Weld!" Mrs. Goddard exclaimed, in tones of well assumed eagerness, "I am so glad you are here! I fear I have taken cold and am going to have a chill; will you be so good as to go down and mix me a hot lemonade and send it out behind the stage to me? for I must go back directly, and I will drink it there."

The housekeeper arose at once and went out into the hall, where she saw that madam appeared excited and trembling, while her face was very pale, although her eyes were unusually bright.

Somehow, she did not believe her to be ill; but she cheerfully acceded to her request, and went directly below to attend to her commission.

As she passed down the back stairs, Edith came hurrying up the front way.

"What has happened?" she inquired.

"The most unfortunate thing that could occur," she nervously replied. "Miss Kerby and her brother, who had the leading parts in the play, have just been summoned home, by telegraph, on account of sickness in the family, and that leaves us without our hero and heroine."

"That is unfortunate, surely; the plan will have to be given up, I suppose?" Edith remarked.

"No, indeed! I should die of mortification!"

"But what can you do?" innocently inquired Edith.

The only thing to be done is to supply their places with others," was the ready answer. "I have a gentleman friend who will take Mr. Kerby's place, and I want you, Edith, to assume the part of the bride; you are just about the size of Alice Kerby, and the costume will fit you to perfection."

"But I am afraid I cannot—I never took part in a play in my life," objected Edith.

"Nonsense! there is but very little for you to do," said madam, "you have simply to walk into the church, upon the arm of the supposed bride's father. You will be masked, and no one will see your face until after all is over, and you have not a word to say, except to repeat the marriage service after the clergyman."

Edith shivered, and her face had grown very pale. She did not like the idea at all; it was exceedingly repugnant to her.

"I wish you could find someone else," she said.

"There is no time," said madam.

"Oh! but it seems almost like sacrilege to me, to stand before such an audience and repeat words so solemn and significant, when they will mean nothing, when the whole thing will be but a farce," Edith remarked.

"You are absurdly conscientious, Edith," madam coldly observed. "There is not another girl in the house upon whom I can call—they are all too large or too small, and the bridal costume would not fit one of them. Pray, pray, Miss Allen, pocket your scruples, for once, and help me out of this terrible predicament—the whole affair will be ruined by this awkward contretemps if you do not, and I, who have promised so much to my friends, shall become the laughing-stock of every one present."

Still the fair girl hesitated.

Some unaccountable influence seemed to be holding her back.

"Oh, Edith! say you will!" cried the woman, appealingly. "You must!" she added, imperatively. "Come to my room—the costume is there all ready, and we will soon have you dressed."

She threw her arm around the girl's slender waist and almost compelled her to accompany her.

The moment they were within Mrs. Goddard's chamber, the woman nervously began to unfasten the young girl's dress but her fingers trembled so with excitement, showing how wrought up she was, that Edith yielded without further demur, and assisted in removing her clothing.

"That is good of you, dear," said madam, smiling upon her, "for we must work very rapidly while the scenery is being changed—we have just fifteen minutes"—glancing at the clock. "How fortunate it is that I asked you to wear white this evening!" the crafty woman remarked, as Edith's dress was removed, thus revealing her dainty under garments, "for you are all ready for the wedding costume without any other change. Here, dear, just help me, please, with this skirt, for the train is so long it needs to be handled with care."

She lifted the beautiful satin skirt from the bed as she spoke, and together they carefully slipped it over the young girl's head.

The next moment it was fastened about her waist, and the lustrous material fell around her slender form in graceful and artistic folds.

The corsage was then put on and—wonderful to relate—it fitted her to perfection.

"How strange! one would almost think it was made for me!" she remarked, all unsuspicious that her measure had been accurately taken from a dress that had been left in the city.

"Ha! ha!" laughed madam, in musical exultation, "I should say that it was a very fortunate coincidence, and it shows that I made a wise choice when I selected you to take Miss Kerby's place. I did not know who else to call upon—of course I could not go out into the audience to find someone, and thus betray my predicament to everybody; neither could I take one of the housemaids, because she would have been sure to blunder and be so awkward. Oh! isn't this dress just lovely?"

Thus madam chattered, while she worked, wholly unlike herself, nervous, anxious, and covertly watching every expression of Edith's sensitive face.

When everything was done, madam stood back to look at her work, and uttered an exclamation of delight.

"Oh! you are simply perfect, Edith!" she said. "You are just too lovely for anything! Miss Kerby would not have made nearly so beautiful a bride, and—and—I could almost wish that you were really going to be married."

"Oh, no!" cried the fair girl, shrinking back from the strange gleam that shone from the woman's eyes, as she made this remark, while her thoughts flew, with the speed of light and with a yearning so intense that it turned her white as snow, to Royal Bryant, the man to whom, all unasked, she had given her heart.

"Ha! ha! not if you could marry the man of your choice?" queried madam.

"Oh! please do not jest about it in this light way—marriage is too sacred to be treated with levity," said Edith in a tremulous tone. "But where is the mask?" she added, glancing anxiously toward the bed. "You know you said the face of the bride was not to be seen."

"Here it is," responded madam, snatching the dainty thing from the bed. "See! it goes on under the veil, like this"—and she dextrously slipped the silver-fringed piece of gauze beneath the edge of the veil and fastened the chain under the orange-wreath behind.

The fringe fell just to Edith's chin, thus effectually concealing her features, while it was not thick enough to prevent her seeing, distinctly, everything about her.

A few other details were attended to, and then Mrs. Goddard hurriedly said:

"Come, now, we must hasten," and she gathered up the voluminous train and laid it carefully over Edith's arm. "We shall have to go the back way, through the billiard-room, because no one must see you until you appear upon the stage."

The carriage-house adjoined the mansion, and was connected with it by a door, at the end of a hall, that opened into a large room over it which had been devoted to billiards.

In the rear of this there was a stairway, which led down to the first floor and behind the stage; thus madam and Edith were enabled to reach the dressing-room without being seen by anyone, and just as the orchestra were playing the closing bars of the last selection before the raising of the curtain.

Here they found a tall, elderly gentleman, in full evening dress, who was to represent the supposed bride's father in giving his child away to the groom.

All the other actors were already grouped upon the stage or in their respective places behind the scenes awaiting the coming of the bride.

Outside, the audience were all upon the qui vive, for, not only was the closing act of the very clever play looked forward to with much interest, for its own sake, but the genuine surprise promised them was a matter for much curious conjecture and eager anticipation.

As Edith stepped upon the stage, leaning upon the arm of her escort, the bridesmaids and maid of honor filed into place before them from the wings and all were ready for the grand finale just as the signal was given for the curtain to go up.

A shiver ran over Edith, shaking her from head to foot as that sharp, incisive sound from the silver bell went ringing through the room.

For, as she had stepped upon the stage and Mrs. Goddard laid her hand upon the arm of the elderly gentleman, she had observed the two exchange meaning smiles, while the maids and ushers, as they had filed into place, had regarded her with marked and admiring curiosity.

The curtain was raised, revealing to the appreciative audience the interior of a beautiful little church.

It was perfect and complete in all its appointments, even to the stained glass windows, the altar, the chancel, the organ, and the exquisite floral decorations suitable for a wedding ceremony.

Simultaneously with this revelation there broke upon the ear and the breathless hush that prevailed throughout the rooms the sound of an organ playing the customary wedding-march.

Presently, at the rear of the church a door opened, and four ushers entered, "with stately tread and slow," followed by as many bridesmaids, dressed in exquisite costumes.

Then came the maid of honor, clad in pale blue satin, and carrying a huge bunch of pink roses that contrasted beautifully with her dainty toilet.

Next the veiled and masked bride appeared, leanin upon the arm of her attendant and clasping a costly bouquet of white orchids, which Mrs. Goddard had produced from some mysterious source, and thrust into her hands at the last moment.

A thrill of awe, mingled with intensest curiosity, pervaded the audience as the graceful figure of the beautiful girl came slowly into view.

The whole affair was so vividly real and impressive that every one watched the scene with breathless interest.

And now, at one side of the chancel another door was seen to open, when a spotlessly gowned clergyman, followed by the groom and best man, entered and proceeded slowly toward the altar.

The two men behind the minister were in full evening dress, the only peculiar thing noticeable being the mask of black gauze edged with silver fringe which the groom wore over his face.

They reached the altar at the same moment that the rest of the bridal party paused before it.

Then, as the clergyman turned his face toward the audience and the light from the chandelier above him fell full upon him, a flutter of excitement ran throughout the room, while many persons were seen to exchange glances of undisguised astonishment, for they had recognized a popular young divine—the pastor of a church, which many of those present, together with their hostess, were in the habit of attending.

What could it mean?

Suddenly, like a flash, it had seemed to burst upon every mind that there was to be a bona fide marriage—that this was to be the "Genine Surprise" that had been promised them!

CHAPTER XIII.

THE DASTARDLY PLOT IS REVEALED.

Every thought and feeling was now merged in intense interest and curiosity regarding the participants in the strange union, which was being consummated before them. Who was the beautiful bride, so perfect in form, so graceful in bearing, so elegantly and richly adorned?

Who the strange groom?

The parts of the plotting lovers of the play had hitherto been taken by the brother and sister—Walter and Alice Kerby, who were well known in society.

But of course every one reasoned that they could not both officiate as principals in the scene now being enacted before them.

The ceremony proceeded, according to the Episcopal form, although the young minister was known to be of another denomination, and when he reached the charge, calling for anyone "who could show just cause why the two before him should not be joined in lawful wedlock, to speak or forever hold his peace," those sitting nearest the stage were startled to see the bride shiver, from head to foot, while a deadly pallor seemed to settle over that portion of her face that was visible, and to even extend over her neck.

The service went on without any interruption, the groom making the responses in clear, unfaltering tones, although those of his companion were scarcely audible.

When the symbol of their union was called for, it was also noticed that Edith shrank from having the ring placed upon her finger, but it was only a momentary hesitation, and the service was soon completed with all due solemnity.

After the blessing, when the couple arose from their knees, the maid of honor stepped forward, and, lifting the mask of the bride, adjusted it above her forehead with the jeweled pin, while the audience sat spellbound, awaiting with breathless suspense the revelation that would ensue.

At the same moment the groom also removed the covering from his face, when those who could see him instantly recognized him as Emil Correlli, the handsome and wealthy brother of the hostess of the evening.

His countenance was white to ghastliness, betraying that he was laboring under great excitement and mental strain.

But the fair young bride! who was she?

Not one in that great company recognized her for the moment, for scarcely anyone had ever seen her before—excepting those, of course, who had been guests in the house during the week, and these failed to identify her in the exquisite costume which was so different from the simple black dresses which she had always worn, and enveloped, as she was, in that voluminous, mist-like veil.

The clergyman omitted nothing, and immediately, upon the lifting of the masks, greeted and congratulated the young couple with every appearance of cordiality and sincerity.

To poor, reluctant Edith the whole affair had been utterly distasteful and repulsive.

Indeed, she had felt as if she was almost guilty of a crime in allowing herself to participate lightly in anything of so sacred a nature, and, throughout the entire ceremony, she had shivered and trembled with mingled nervousness and repugnance.

When the ring—an unusually massive circlet of gold—had been slipped upon her finger, she had involuntarily tried to withdraw her hand from the clasp of the man who was holding it, a sensation of deadly faintness almost overpowering her for the moment.

But feeling that she must not fail madam and spoil everything at this last moment, she braced herself to go on with the farce (?) to the end.

She was so relieved when it was ended, so eager to get away from the place and have the dread ordeal over, that she scarcely heard a word the clergyman uttered while congratulating her. She was dimly conscious of the clasp of his hand and the sound of his voice, but did not even notice the hated name by which he addressed her.

Neither had she once glanced at the groom, though as he took her hand and laid it upon his arm, when they turned to go out, she wondered vaguely why he should continue to hold it clasped in his, and what made his clinging fingers tremble so.

But Emil Correlli, now that his scheme was accomplished, led her, with an air of mingled triumph and joy which sat well upon him, directly up to the ladies' dressing-room, where they found madam alone awaiting them.

She could not have been whiter if she had been dead, and her teeth were actually chattering with nervousness as the two came toward her. Edith still with bowed head and downcast eyes—her brother beaming with the exultation he could not conceal.

But she braced herself to meet them with a brave front.

"Dear child, you went through it beautifully," she said, in a caressing voice as she took Edith into her arms and kissed her upon the forehead. "Let me thank and congratulate you—and you also, Emil."

At the sound of this name, Edith uttered a cry of dismay and turned her glance, for the first time, upon the man at her side.

"You!" she gasped, starting away from him with a gesture of horror, and marble could not have been whiter, nor a statue more frozen than she for a moment after making this amazing discovery.

"Hush!" imperatively exclaimed Mrs. Goddard, who quickly arose to the emergency. "Do not make a scene, It could not be helped—some one had to take Mr. Kerby's place, and Emil, arriving at the last moment, was pressed into the service the same as yourself."

"How could you? It was cruel! it was wicked! I never would have consented had I suspected," cried the girl in a voice resonant with indignation.

"Hush!" again commanded madam, "you must not—you shall not spoil everything now. The actors are all to hold an informal reception in the parlors while this room is being cleared for dancing, and you two must take your places with them——"

"I will not! I will not lend myself to such a wretched farce for another moment!" Edith exclaimed, and never for an instant suspecting that it was anything but a farce.

The face of Mrs. Goddard was a study, as was also her brother's, as these resolute words fell upon her ears; but she had no intention of undeceiving the girl at present, for she knew that if she threw up the character which she had thus far been impersonating, their plot would be ruined and a fearful scandal follow.

If they could only trick her into standing with the others to receive the congratulations of her guests—to be publicly addressed as, and appear to assent to the name of Mrs. Correlli, she believed it would be comparatively easy later on to convince her of the truth and compel her to yield to the inevitable.

But just at this instant the bridesmaids came trooping into the room and created a blessed diversion.

"Here we are, dear Mrs. Goddard," a gay girl exclaimed. "Didn't it all go off beautifully, and My love thus secret to convey."

IT was a beautiful tableau that the old Colonel gazed upon, old in theme but always new and beautiful when the participants are youthful and have the eagerness of life in their souls.

The man was young, tall and broad-shouldered, with features glorified with his honest love, the young woman was slender, petite and trustfully lovely in her girlish beauty. She leaned against him, his heart her haven.

The soft radiance of the electrolier fell upon them, and upon the tiny table on which lay a red, heart-shaped box of dainty sweets and a cluster of brilliant pansies.

The young couple were garbed in fashion of times long agone,—the style of the Sixties.

The whole spoke mutely the two greatest words: Love and Romance.

The Colonel smiled, and sighed too, for this dainty bit of femininity, his only grandchild, was very dear to him. He and his beautiful old wife, who still abode with him, thanks to a gracious Providence, had been both parents and grandparents to this living reminder of their departed son and daughter-in-law.

He stood for a moment or two, lost in the shadows of the silken drapes which hung before the drawing-room entrance, then as the young man's lips met those of his sweetheart, he waited a moment or two longer, then hemmed a little, and came into the room.

At his entrance, young Farnsworth flustered, then drew the girl more closely to his side, as she, with maiden modesty tried to draw from him, and stood in a proud, possessory manner, waiting for the Colonel to speak.

Colonel Dare looked upon him with kindly indulgence.

"As this is St. Valentine's Day, and this is your Valentine," and he touched the heart-shaped box of bon-bons, "I am going to ask you what kind of Valentine Virginia has given in return. The truth now, for I may have eavesdropped," and he smiled encouragingly.

"She has given me herself, Colonel, the very dearest and best Valentine I could want—that is, provided you consent."

"Why should I object?" he queried. "It is meet that Virginia should sometime find a mate, and go to a nest of her own, and I could not select a more fitting partner for her than she has done herself. Farnsworth, my boy, I admire and love you above all young men I know, and my blessing goes with Virginia—and latterly, my purse."

Young Farnsworth glowed at the praiseful words.

"I thank you sir. It is but a poor tribute to your words, but I can think of no other. I realize that I am almost a trespasser in coming and taking from you the joy of your life, but, believe me, I shall endeavor to show that you have not lost a granddaughter, but have gained a son, and a son's love and respect."

"I know that; that is why I welcome you. And whenever you are ready to wed, let me know in time, so that grandma and I may fashion our wedding clothes," and he kissed Virginia.

"Where are you young people going tonight?" he questioned, changing the subject.

"To the Clarendons' Fancy Dress Ball. I am representing a belle of the crinoline days, and Stewart is a beau of the times."

"You are quite in fashion, then, my dear. Those crinoline gowns! How I have always admired them, and how sorry I am that they are no longer in style. How many a beautiful belle did I see garbed in that kind of gown, and how my heart quickened at the sight of one. Somehow, they seemed to make even plain faces pretty! Oh, I was quite a romancer in those old war days! I wonder if you'd care to hear the story of a little romance in which I participated?"

"Indeed, grandfather, yes. We have plenty of time before we need go."

"All right," the old Colonel responded, and seating himself on a davenport near the fire which sparkled and snapped, and with Virginia on one side and Stewart Farnsworth on the other, and holding each gently by the wrist in such a manner that after a little it seemed quite proper for the small feminine hand to be lost in the bold, strong grasp of the masculine, the old Colonel commenced his story.

"Naturally all this happened during the war. I had been with Sherman on his march through Georgia, 'from Atlanta to the Sea,' and now we wended our way northward, our destination being Columbia, the capital of South Carolina.

"We had our orders. They were to forage freely, horses and mules were to be snapped up, but private dwellings were not to be entered unless there was any suspicion that Confederate soldiers might be concealed therein. But how easy a suspicion!

"Our march through the Carolinas was dreadful. The country was low and swampy, intersected by rivers; sometimes the swamps were almost impassible. It was in winter time, as a matter of fact it was two days after St. Valentine's Day, Feb. 16, when we reached the city of Columbia.

"As a recent historian so aptly put it, 'the feeling was that South Carolina had taken lead in the Rebellion; she should, therefore, be made to feel the scourge of the war' was uppermost during that march, and so whenever there was a chance for foraging, we weren't any too lenient.

"I, like most of the boys, from the first had been full of patriotic enthusiasm, and nothing would satisfy me but that I answer Lincoln's call for volunteers, and being ambitious, I worked hard, and received several promotions, so that at the time of the march on Columbia, I was a captain.

"We continued our march, and it happened that on February 14, we camped for the night on the outskirts of a small town. It was a pretty, pastoral sort of a place, with residences few and far between, each surrounded by a large, imposing estate. Not far from where we camped, perhaps half a mile, there stood one grand old mansion, one of those picturesque affairs which we now tenderly remark always brings back 'memories of the South before the War.' It was a red brick affair, with a huge white colonnade and veranda.

"While encamped news came to us that in this fine old house, a Valentine party was to be held, and that many of the Southern belles expected their soldier sweethearts. On hearing of our approach, however, warning was sent to their soldier friends not to come near. The place it seemed, was a gathering place for them, and their hatred of the North was of the kind that has become proverbial.

"The news in hand, I was ordered to take a squad of men and keep guard at the house and capture any Rebels I might und and bring them to headquarters. I thought it hardly possible that the Rebels would attempt to see their sweethearts, with our army in such close proximity, but love is a scorner of all things, you know, and when I recall the beauty of those young women, I wouldn't have been surprised had some of those hot-blooded chaps taken a chance.

"Well, I summoned a squad of privates, the best lads I could find, and we marched up to the house. Through the windows, we saw dainty feminine forms moving about, and light girlish laughter rippled like a faint breeze.

"I hated to disturb the house and the innocent joys of these much harrassed little Southerners, but duty was paramount always so I could do nothing less than go to the door and knock.

"It was opened by a black mammy who held a candle high above her head, and whose eyes popped forth looks of terror.

"'Hello, Aunty,' I greeted, 'I guess I'll have to disturb the party.'

"As I spoke, I noted the slender form of a girl behind her, a girl, whom, for want of a better phrase, I must use the much hackneyed one, a Southern beauty. She was dressed in a crinoline of some silky material, the many ruffles of which were embroidered with dainty pink roses and rose-buds. The bodice was sharp pointed, as was the fashion, and embroidered with the same dainty roses. About her shoulders she wore a fissue of soft white silk and lace, but she was utterly without jeweled ornament of any sort. Her eyes were perfect, her skin angel white, and set off with a tiny patch or two. Her hair, glorious, glistening brown which in the light of the candle threw off a vague halo, she wore in curls and several of these rested on her white shoulder.

"Her eyes dilated when she saw who her callers were, but instantly the momentary fear vanished. She held her candle a little distance from her face, which brought out the distracting beauty of her tender lips. I had seen many a Southern beauty, but at the sight of this girl, so dainty, so small, yet so determined in her inherent bravery, my heart quickened, my head seemed to spin, and for a moment I lost all command of myself. I could not understand the sensation that came upon me; then it dawned upon me! In a flash, at a glance, I had fallen in love with a daughter of the enemy!

"As I stood there gazing, I hardly knew what to say; I could see her dainty throat and breast heaving with the tumult she had difficulty in squelching, and which so rankled her heart.

"I stepped upon the threshold, and motioned the men to enter. They were kindly fellows, fellows whom I trusted, and who had, I knew, beloved womenkind at home, and who, while loyal to the core, would do their utmost ere they would, unnecessarily, frighten a woman, or destroy things out of sheer malice.

"My squad entered, and stood awaiting my orders. I, too, stood, very loath to begin. We were in a big, hospitable room, wherein a fire burned cheerfully in the grate. Everywhere about there was the appearance of recent depletion of wealth, yet there was still a maintenance of dignity about the house.

"Besides the beautiful young hostess, there were nine other young beauties, all clad in the fashion of my Lady o' Crinoline, and upon our entrance, they gathered into several little groups. In the center of one of these was a stately old woman whom I had no difficulty in recognizing as the mother of the object of my sudden adoration.

"I noted that the young ladies had been busy writing, and their epistles lay upon various small tables, stands and window-seats, while upon a writing desk lay a box of water colors, brushes and the like. I wondered what they were doing, but at the moment did not guess.

"The quiet of death came upon the room, while all the young women eyed us with varying degrees of terror, distrust, and only a faint sign of hope.

"'Madame,' I at length began, addressing the older woman, but with my eyes for the most part upon the young lady, 'we have been informed that the young ladies gathered here had planned a party and were expecting gentlemen of the Southern army. Much as we dislike to intrude, I fear we shall be obliged to search the house for any soldiers which you may have hidden here, if indeed you have.'

"The beautiful girl raised her eyes, and with cold formality responded:

"'Search. We have no voice in the matter.'

"'I am very sorry, my dear young lady——' but with proud scorn, she interrupted:

"'It is one of the privileges of war. Proceed.'

"'We will be as quick and quiet as possible,' I answered. 'Believe me, I am very sorry we must disturb you. If we find no one, my men will camp outside, though I fear you will be obliged to endure my presence. But you may go on with your party. I must keep the house watched, for,' and I had to smile for I couldn't help it any more than the compliment that was coming, 'knowing your soldiers as I do, appreciating their bravery, and seeing you young ladies, I wouldn't be a bit surprised if some of your lovers didn't risk meeting us just to see you.'

"She could not squelch her pride, I saw, when I praised the Rebels. I bade the men proceed with the search, and seated myself as far from the young women as possible. I felt all those pairs of eyes upon me, and, if you will pardon the conceit, I was a rather handsome chap, so even in spite of the fact that I was a villainous Yankee, I may have interested the young ladies nevertheless.

"Suddenly I heard a commotion up-stairs, a considerable stamping of feet, then a roar of laughter from my men. In a few moments, two of them, Sterling and Richards came down with their 'Rebel.' From all appearances, he had captured them, for he had them by their coat-sleeves and was dragging them into my presence. The lad was in his night-clothes, and his fair, curling hair was tousled. His eyes burned with indignation.

"'Say,' he began, addressing me, 'are you a Yank Captain?'

"'I believe I am, young sir,' I responded.

"'Well, your men here are looking for Rebels. And I'm a Rebel, sir!'

"'Are you?'

"'I reckon I am, and when I grow up, I'm going to fight you. I hope the war lasts long enough.'

"'Thank you, sonny. With your valiant spirit, I'm quite certain you'd kill me dead beyond a doubt,' and I patted his head, or rather, I attempted to, for in trying to draw the lovable little fellow to me, he jerked away.

"'I know I would,' he returned coolly. Then: 'Are you going to take me prisoner?' he continued.

"'Shall I?' I questioned. 'I believe I shall for we Yankees need a few little Rebel boys to black our boots. We'll set you to doing that.'

"'I'd never do it, no, I wouldn't, not even if you'd kill me!'

"'Well, sonny,' I answered him, 'I hardly think I'd take particular pleasure in killing so fine spirited a lad as you. Come, shake hands, and let's be friends. For we were once brothers. Do you realize that?'

"'I'll not touch your hand. It has killed too many Southerners.'

"'It has never killed a man outside of battle, my boy. In battle, by the dictates of stern duty, it has done many a thing which it would not otherwise do. Some day, little fellow, I hope I'll see you and be able to call you "brother."' I forgot, for a moment, the tender years of my young auditor, then recalling myself, I laughed off the whole matter and continued: 'But after all, why shouldn't you shake? You tell me I've killed Southerners, but didn't you say just now you'd like to fight me, and I've no doubt, kill me?'

"This rather took him aback, but undaunted however, he continued:

"'Anyhow, I hate and despise you, and mother hates and despises you, and all these young ladies hate and despise you, and my sister hates——'

"It was more than I could stand. To be told that I was hated by that glorious young woman, hurt. I gently put my hand upon his lips.

"'Don't say that, boy. God knows that I do not hate you all, as you hate me.'

"During this time, the young women had remained mute. Several times, indeed, the stately mother had intended stopping the prattle of the lad, but seeing that it amused me she said nothing. These last words of the boy, however, roused her fine sense of breeding.

"'Come, Hal,' she said quietly, 'you must not say that. Go with Aunt Dinah. She will put you to bed.'

"'I'll not go with that Yank in the house,' he objected.

"'The Yankee is a gentleman, Hal. Go.'

"The lad went off with Aunt Dinah, after making a cautious wry face at me, his eyes glowering in the light of the candle with which fat Dinah lighted the way.

"After the lad's departure, quiet fell upon the room.

"'Please do not mind me,' I spoke up. 'I do not want to interrupt your party. Pray go on as if I were not present.'

"They took me at my word. And gracious, how they knew how to ignore! Immediately they went to their unfinished work, and a girlish buzz hung over the room punctuated with merry laughs and scandalized little shrieks at something my Lady o' Crinoline was writing. I felt it had some reference to me though I pretended to be absorbed in my own thoughts, though in reality I was watching the bright faces, though enshrined in my mind was only the face of the young hostess.

"At length they finished their epistles which were. I now discovered, valentines and love-tokens to their lovers. The little verses, though obviously the products of amateurs, nevertheless held the strain of that undying love which they bore for the boys who were far away where the fighting was. They read them aloud, laughing now and then at some bright and humorous couplet, or with eyes dimming as some reference was made to the uncertainty of the future.

"The verses were embellished by the young lady of artistic ability, and finally were put up and sealed tenderly. Would they all reach their destination, I wondered? Perhaps some of the intended recipients were even then lying low.

"Nothing could induce the hostess to read her verses, however. She would read them latterly, she said, and just then, an old mammy announced supper.

"She threw open the large doors in the west wall of the room, revealing a table neatly, but plainly set. Where hospitality had once scintillated, now only glamours of it remained. The young ladies went into the dining-room, the doors were closed, and I was left to myself.

"Well tired of sitting, I was glad to get up and walk about the room. I crossed to where the young hostess had sat while writing, and having previously noted that she slipped her verses under a pad of paper, I raised the pad and secured the 'poem.'

"I snatched it up, then listened. But all I heard was the soft clatter of knives upon plates, and rippling laughter, and I could not help but admire the nonchalance these young women displayed in the face of what would have scared present-day young ladies into fits.

"Then I read the 'Valentine,' for it was mine! Mine, though I was not supposed to have it. In these days we would call it a 'comical' one, I expect. The verses as I remember them, were something like this:

"'If all the men I knew were Yanks,
And wore the Northern blue,
I'd rather rest 'neath mossy banks,
Than pay them homage true.

"'A vile and wretched set are they
Their hearts are all of flint,
They interrupt our parties gay,
And cannot take a hint.

"'There's one within our precincts now,
Who wears a suit of blue,
Come, girls we'll oust him now, I vow,
For he disgusts our view.'

"I conned over the verses, written on the spur of the moment, then I stuck the paper into my bosom. Even though the 'valentine' caricatured me, still it was dear for the awful words had been penned by the woman I loved.

"Suddenly I became aware of steps approaching, and I hurried back to my seat and sat down. The young hostess entered.

"She did not even glance at me, but crossed the room to her writing, while I watched her in amused silence. Her hands fluttered through the papers, a provoked little expression came to her eyes, then with a sudden raising of her brows, she looked at me. I gave forth no sign.

"Feeling obliged to say something because of her sudden, penetrating gaze, I suppose, she said in a cold, yet courteous voice:

"'If you are hungry, we shall be willing to share our meagre supplies with you.'

"'Thank you, my lady,' I replied, 'you have need of all you have, and I am not hungry. I thank you from the bottom of my heart, however, and appreciate your thoughtfulness.'

"She said nothing, but went again to looking among her papers, then finding her efforts to find what she sought fruitless, she turned away.

"'Stay a moment,' I said, rising, and going to her side. 'What were you looking for?'

"Jove, what a look she gave me! But paying no attention to it, I continued: 'Is it this? This valentine you left for me?'

"She laughed scornfully. That finished me. I crushed my hands, one in the other, lest they should catch those of the glorious woman laughing at me.

"'Ah, Lady o' Crinoline!' I cried. 'Am I so disagreeable? Do you hate and despise me? Can't you even respect me for honoring a cause which I believe is right though you do not?'

"I did not understand her look of terror, but

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

John Lispenard, cousin to Kit Belton's mother, marries a Canadian girl. Dying he leaves a widow, two girls, Agatha and Nerine, and one son Maurice. Mrs. Lispenard marries Clarence Mayne, an interloper. At her decease she leaves Clarence Mayne an income until the girls are of age. Lispenard house and money go to the male heir in the direct line. Clarence Mayne goes on a trip to Monte Carlo, Kit Belton comes on a visit, while Maurice Lispenard, denied the education which is his by right, walks from Liverpool, where he is learning to be a mechanical engineer, to be with Kit Belton.

CHAPTER III.

"NO OTHER MAN SHALL HAVE YOU!"

THE three girls and Maurice sat at breakfast; Kit radiant in her fur-trimmed dress once more dry and wearable; Agatha and Nerine in the plainest of serges, which were their outdoor wear and only put on in honor of their brother.

"Maurice," said Agatha, "what are we going to do today?"

Out of doors the winter sun shone gloriously; the air was sharp but not frosty, though all the shrubs and flower beds in the garden glittered with impalpable atoms like diamonds.

"We must do something."

Maurice turned over the morning paper which Jane had been dispatched for with much grandeur. Mr. Mayne never had a local paper, and the London ones which he read were never seen by his stepchildren.

"There's a football match; we'll go to that," Maurice said, running his eyes down the columns. "It begins at three; that gives us just time to get there nicely after lunch."

"Where?" cried Agatha. "The Arlington ground?"

As Maurice nodded she added:

"My good boy, it's five miles! Much too far for Kit to walk, though we might"—thoughtfully—"go in an omnibus."

"We'll drive." The line of Maurice's young mouth suddenly hardened. "There are horses in the stable."

"Mr. Mayne left orders," Nerine said, dryly, "about those horses. If you care to be snubbed by Jones, go and say we will take them out."

"Jones is here?"

"Of course. On board wages."

"Good!" said Maurice, enigmatically.

"Who is the match between?" Nerine asked.

Of course they would end by going in an omnibus—in which case she would stay at home.

"The county and the garrison."

He read over the lists of the two elevens. All the county names he knew; their visiting cards reposed on the Lispenard hall table. Once a year the girls, sulky and silent, accompanied Mr. Mayne to leave theirs, written cards, which looked plebeian beside Mayne's neat copperplate.

Maurice skimmed over the names of the garrison eleven.

"Hello! Satterlee!" he exclaimed. "I didn't know he was here. I thought he was abroad."

"Who is he?" Nerine pricked up her ears.

"The brother of a fellow I know in Liverpool, and a very good chap, too. We'll have to go and see him play. At a quarter past two we'll start, eh?" looking at Kit.

"Too late. The omnibus takes so long," Agatha said.

"We're going in the T cart," the boy returned, rising, tall and broad-shouldered, to leave the room.

Lighting his pipe, he strolled through the brisk morning air down the garden to the back door of the stables. There was no one there. The pair of bay horses which Mr. Mayne was obliged to keep stood peacefully in their stalls; the stable cat dozed in the sunlight in the harness-room window.

Jones had been there and gone, for the horses had been fed and their feeds cleared away. Maurice stood and cogitated outside the door till his smoke was finished. Then he rapped his pipe smartly on the window sill.

Steps sounded on the lane in front of the stable as he did so. Jones was letting himself in by the front way and Maurice shouted to him.

Mr. Mayne's man of all work was a broken-down jockey. Jones was a conveniently common name, and his own at one time had been inconveniently well known. The man's wizened face blanched as Maurice called him by it loudly.

"Mr. Lispenard!"

His voice croaked always, but it was terribly husky now. He had been taking advantage of Clarence Mayne's absence the night before, and he had not got his nerve back so early in the day.

He shuffled out into the daylight, not old, but prematurely shriveled, shattered by a life of hard exercise and bad liquor.

"You're not looking well, Lister," Maurice said slowly, his piercing gaze full on him.

Jones put up his hand.

"For Heaven's sake, sir, don't call me that!"

"Why not?"—equably. "It's your name."

Jones swore volubly; it was not, never had been.

Maurice pulled him up with a stern word.

"Did you ever hear of Lord Satterlee?" he said. "Perhaps not. I am living at present with Mr. Vivian Satterlee, who gave me some valuable facts concerning you."

Jones was sober in one instant. The Satterlees could have him sentenced to penal servitude even now.

"Do they know where I am sir?" he asked, respectfully, with underlying cunning.

"That's neither here nor there," Maurice replied. "The point just now is that I will have the horses in the T cart at two o'clock. I am going to see Lord Satterlee play football. I shall not take you."

"Mr. Mayne's orders is that the horses is only to go for exercise," doggedly.

"Very well. My orders"—Maurice seemed suddenly to tower over the man, the Lispenard "black look" on his grim young face—"are what I've said. If you don't like them perhaps Lord Satterlee will help you to—another situation," significantly.

"All right, sir, all right," the man rejoined, angrily. He would have given worlds to disobey, but he dared not. "Mr. Mayne shall know of this," he blustered, weakly.

"Mr. Mayne," Maurice said, abruptly, "is in France. Lord Satterlee is stationed five miles off."

Jones touched his cap in sulky silence.

His lips were dry as he harnessed the horses. This cursed young cock sparrow had the upper hand of him, and no mistake. Had he dared he would have lamed the horses, but a sharp fellow like Mr. Lispenard would have seen through that.

Presently, therefore, the trap was at the hall door; the horses shining in the sun, the brass-mounted harness glittering; the varnish on the seldom-used T cart was perhaps a little ancient, but otherwise the Lispenard turnout was unexceptionable.

Agatha could not believe her eyes. She and Nerine got in the back seat in a kind of dumb amazement. Maurice had taken their going as a matter of course—yet never before had she known him anything but routed by Jones.

"How on earth did he manage it?" she inquired of Nerine, who shrugged her shoulders indifferently.

It was a perfect day, and she had not been for a drive for two years. Those annual visitations of their neighbors she did not call drives, accompanied as they were with Mr. Mayne in the brougham. She would not trouble her head about anything so small as Jones.

Kit, perched up in front beside Maurice, warm in her sealskin coat, her hat of golden pheasant feathers set lightly on her yellow curls, looked like a small tropical bird. Agatha and Nerine in their humble blue serge, their felt hats with plain ribbons, their woolen-backed, leather-palmed winter gloves, were simple enough beside her. It was as well that their clear-cut faces and smooth Greek heads had small need of fripperies.

It was a good five miles from Lispenard House to the Arlington Club ground, through the town and past the barracks. Nerine did not remember ever having been there since they had been used to go with Maurice, all Lobbledehoys together. This was a very different story.

They were early, and the twins occupied themselves in watching the gathering crowd. A few people bowed to them, with some surprise at seeing them anywhere but in church or rambling through the country lanes. Nerine's cheeks flushed rose pink as she returned those wondering recognitions with distant frigidity. The county rather approved of Clarence Mayne; it condemned unheard the Lispenards.

Kit and Maurice were true football lovers. The blankets had hardly been put on the horses before they were lost in the game. Nerine and Agatha were less earnest.

"That's a good-looking man near the goal post. I wonder who he is?" Nerine said, idly.

"Garrison," Agatha returned, looking at his jersey. "Perhaps he is Maurice's friend with the funny name!"

"Too good-looking."

Nerine pointed to a square red-faced little man playing quarter back.

"That is much more likely to be he," she declared.

Agatha gazed at the strong slim figure of the handsome man as he ran like lightning across the field. How his bare head shone in the sun. It was more golden than Kit's.

"Maurice, who's that fair man playing for the garrison?" she asked, pinching his arm vigorously to call his attention. "The one rushing now with the ball. Oh, look, he was nearly down."

"Not he," said Maurice. "Well played, Satterlee!"

"I told you that was Satterlee," Agatha said, quietly. "I've seen him before, Nerine."

"Where?" Nerine asked, incredulously.

"Three or four times in church," she answered, rather weakly.

Every Sunday for the past three months would have been more to the point. Nerine never went to church except sometimes to the gorgeous ceremonial of a festival. Her feelings for Mr. Mayne did not accord with church-going.

She said nothing, and they watched the game in silence, till half time was called and the players trooped thirstily over to the pavilion.

"Maurice," Agatha said, "is he Captain Satterlee or Mr. Satterlee?"

"He's a lieutenant, but he's a viscount, too. Surely you know that."

"We are not on intimate terms with the aristocracy. We leave that to Mr. Mayne," Nerine observed, dryly.

Over at the pavilion a man who had hurried into his coat was scanning through a field glass the faces of the twins. One of them was the tall girl he had fallen into the way of going to St. Jude's to see; but which one? They were so exactly alike. At the moment Maurice turned his head to answer his sister.

"Lispenard, by all that's lucky! Why, they must be his sisters!"

Lord Satterlee relinquished his glass and went over. He shook hands with Maurice, then the sun glanced on his yellow hair as he acknowledged Miss Belton's bow and was introduced to the Lispenard sisters.

But in spite of his scrutinizing glance at them, Satterlee was none the wiser as to which of them he already knew by sight.

"Didn't Vivian tell you I was here, Lispenard?" he inquired, wondering desperately at which of those demure people he had been accustomed to gaze during the sermon.

"I haven't seen him lately; he's been with your mother and I've been busy. It's luck, my coming across you this morning," returned the boy, joyfully.

"Agatha," Kit turned round to whisper to her, "do you know that we are the observed of all observers? I think"—laughing—"that we are being much admired!"

Agatha's smile died away on her lips.

Maurice's voice was rising loud and cheery in her very ear as he asked Satterlee to dine with them the next day. Almost before she had found her breath again Maurice's speaking hand was on her shoulder, forcing her into seconding the invitation, feebly and with eyes anywhere but on the object of it. And Satterleee—oh, horror!—would be delighted!

Miss Lispenard sat stunned. Who would cook? Worse still, who would wait? Who was bold enough to burst into the china and glass closet—and the wine cellar?

"You've done it," Kit observed to Maurice, as they drove away, the match over. "Done it really—thoroughly!"

"Maurice, how could you?" Nerine broke in. "Fancy asking even a well-to-do eat to come and dine with us! And what are we to do for servants?"

"We'll get servants!" said Maurice, unabashed. "My dear girl, if you knew how friendly Satterlee and his mother have been to me you'd know I had to ask him."

"Maurice," exclaimed Agatha, "where are we going to have dinner? Not in the morning room!"

Nerine, at the prospect of having a dinner party and defying the absent Mr. Mayne, laughed aloud.

"We'll break open the dining-room——" she began.

Maurice turned round on her.

"Do you mean to tell me Mayne has had the impertinence to lock the door of any room in the house but his own?" he demanded.

"I mean that every one of the down-stairs rooms but ours is locked," Nerine returned, composedly. "I suppose he is afraid of our pawning the drawing-room ornaments or the best spoons!"

"Well, I'm blowed if he shan't find them unlocked when he gets back. Thank goodness, we've only ten months more of him!"

The horses were going at a good pace, and they were passing a heavy cart, so that the two girls in the back seat did not hear Kitty Belton speaking softly to Maurice.

"Are you sure," she said, "that you have ten months more before the girls come of age?"

"What?" Maurice stared. "Of course I'm sure."

"How old are you?"

"Nineteen," he answered, gruffly, for he hated his youth, "but I dare say I look older."

"You do; much," thoughtfully.

"What do you mean, Kit?" the boy asked after a long pause; "or do you mean anything?"

"I can't tell you here. Nothing, perhaps"—her forehead clouded—"but I was wondering if mamma could be right and Mr. Mayne wrong. Well, don't bother now. I don't want to tell the girls till I tell you. Wait till we're alone."

It was not till very late that afternoon that they were alone, Agatha and Nerine having gone out for a stroll in the garden after tea. Up and down they walked and talked, as they did every evening. Tonight it was Nerine who had the floor, and she talked of nothing but Satterlee, a subject on which Agatha had not a word to say, though her tongue was wont to run nimbly.

Indoors, Kit and Maurice sat in more or less one-sided conclave.

It had grown chilly with evening, and they had drawn their chairs on the hearth rug. In her yellow tea gown, with her small feet outstretched to the heat and a lovely fire-burned color glowing in her face, Kit was a sight to delight Maurice's eyes. He had not seen such for many a long day, and it put the thought of what she might have to say to him quite out of his head.

"What do you think I am usually doing at this hour?" he said, turning to her.

"I don't know," absently.

"Standing a grimy, sweltering object in the machine shop!" and he laughed merrily. "Rather different from this, eh? Kit," reproachfully, "you're not listening."

"No; I'm thinking," she returned, slowly, her sweet little face very thoughtful. "Maurice, your father died when you were a baby, didn't he?"

"Yes. Why?"

"And your mother married again when you were—how old?"

"Two. Seventeen years ago. Tell me, why are you asking me all these things that you know as well as I do?"

"Because my mother says that you were four seventeen years ago. Hush; wait! You know how mother never destroys anything. Well the other day she found some old letters, and among them was one from your father, giving the date of his marriage with your mother, and one from your mother when she was going to be married to Mr. Mayne. In it she said it would be an advantage to her children now to have a father's care, for they were growing quite big, the twins being already five years old and Maurice a year younger."

"Did you bring the letter?" he eagerly asked.

"No, but mother has it quite safely. Listen, Maurice. You know mother scarcely saw you children before your mother died, and when she came to the funeral she thought you all wonderfully big and old looking for your ages, when Mr. Mayne said you were only four and three. But she did not pay much attention really and never thought of your mother's old letter till the other day, when she came across it by accident, Maurice!" impatiently, "why don't you say something? Don't you know that if mamma is right you are all two years older than you think?" with desperate emphasis.

Maurice got up and stood with his back to her, looking into the fire.

"If I find out that is really true I believe I'll kill him," he said, with impressive emphasis. "Kit, Kit, if it isn't, why have you told me?"

"It is—it must be true. Mamma is always accurate," she said, firmly. "And if that letter, dated seventeen years ago, says you were four at that time, and your father died when you were a little baby, why, don't you see that all you have to do is to get the exact date of his death or the registration of your birth to find out how old you really are. And then you could act at once!"

Maurice did not turn round.

"My darling Kit," he said, softly, "you forget that my father was killed in a mine and that his body was never found; and in Nova Scotia until the last five years there has not been any registration of births or deaths. I wrote once when I was sixteen or so to an address I found in a book of my mother's to ask if anything were known as to the death of my father, and I had an answer from the son of the man I wrote to—he himself was dead—saying that a Mr. Lispenard had been killed at the mines, but that he could not get any information regarding the date. Neither birth nor deaths were registered officially, and there was no one at the mines now who remembered any people called Lispenard. So that door is shut."

"You must have been baptized, and your mother must have had a copy of the baptismal certificate."

"Mr. Mayne has all her papers—if there are any. And as for the church I was christened in—why, Kit, it may have been anywhere from British Columbia to Nova Scotia. I don't know where I was born and neither do the girls! The only evidence we have to go on is that old letter of my mother's, and I don't know whether that is of any use or not."

"We have your looks—and the girls," said Kit, doggedly, in the midst of her disappointment. "And I believe them. Do you look only nineteen?" shrewdly.

But Maurice could not rise to the bait of his detested youth.

"I can't believe it," he said, sitting down beside her rather dreamily. "And if I did believe it, I can't go on a wild-goose chase to America trying to find out where I was born. It would use up all the ten months that are left, in any case," and he laughed rather grimly, "even if I had the money to go on."

Kit turned scarlet. She rose rather stiffly and stood looking at him.

"All right," she said. "I'm sorry I said anything, since you seem to care so little. I told you because I knew if you were of age and had your money, mamma would let us be engaged and everything would be right. As it is it may interest you to know that another man has proposed to me, though, of course, I shall never be forced to marry him!"

She moved toward the door with some dignity after that suggestive threat.

Maurice sprung after her.

"Kit, you torture me," he said as she pushed him away from her. "It would be bad for Mr. Mayne if I lost you through any work of his. Only I don't honestly see what we are to do."

Kit eyed him for one instant where he towered above her, but before speaking she had the grace to hide her head.

"Mr. Mayne is away," she remarked from the depths of Maurice's arms. "Let you and me go and rummage all through his papers. That is one of the things I came for."

"We can't," stoutly. "Here are the girls. Don't tell them, Kit. I couldn't bear to talk of it, and Agatha would never speak of anything else. Write to your mother for the letter."

He kissed her with sudden passion.

"I adore you!" he said. "And whether I am of age or not, I swear no other man shall have you. But I don't think I could bring myself to wade through the dirty waters of Mayne's affairs in the way you suggest, even for you, my dearest."

Terms Used in Knitting

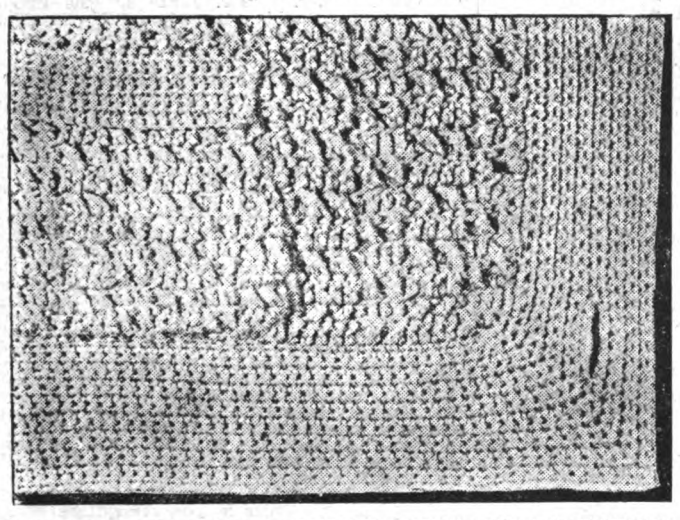
K. knit plain; o. over; o. 2, over twice; n. narrow 2 stitches together; p. purl, meaning an inversion of stitches; sl. slip a stitch; tog. together; sl. and b., slip and bind; k. p. knit plain; stars and parenthesis indicate repetition.

Crocheted Sweater

THIS handsome sweater is wholly crocheted in blocks of plain and crossed double crochet. The body of the sweater shown was of greenish blue wool trimmed with cuffs and collar of white.

Materials required. From five to seven, skeins of Germantown according to how one works, and the size of the garment made, one and one half skeins of white, one medium-size bone hook.

The work should be firm and close but not tight; however it is almost better to err in this direction, than to work too loosely. An even stitch or tension one should try to maintain throughout for if stitches here and there are large and loose the weight of the finished garment, will cause these loose stitches to pull out and become holes.



Directions for Sweater

For 36-inch sweater begin by making chain 95 stitches. This chain is the bottom of the back of the sweater.

1st row.—1 d. c. in 4th st. from hook, 1 d. c., in each of the next 3 sts., then 1 d. c. in second st. from last double, now holding the work down between thumb and finger, make 1 d. c. behind last d. c. in the chain st., which was skipped. These 2 doubles make 1 crossed double. Skip next st., 1 d. c. in next, then 1 d. c. behind this d. c. in the st. skipped. Now look at the work closely, for one block of 4 d. c. and 1 block of 2 crossed doubles have been completed and the whole garment is made of these two different blocks. In next 4 sts. work 4 d. c., then 2 crossed doubles, repeat to end of chain, making 30 blocks in all. ch. 3, turn.

2nd row.—2 crossed doubles over the 4 d. c., work these through nearest loop of each st., next 4 d. c., worked through further loops of each st., next 1 x d. blk. worked as before then 1 d. c. blk. In making these blocks extreme care should be used in working each in the right 4 stitches or in placing each block directly over the one below it. Also notice that the x doubles are always worked on nearer loops and plain doubles on further loops. Finish each row with ch. 3, before turning.

A striped rather than a blocked effect may be obtained by working blocks of x ds. over x ds. and plain d. c. on plain d. c.; if one finds it confusing to place the blocks alternately or even a simpler and yet effective pattern may be worked out by blocks all of doubles, in this way; 4 d. c. on nearer loops, 4 d. c. on further loops, 4 d. c. on nearer etc., next row alternate the blocks, for instance if last 4 d. c. come on nearest loops make first block on next row on nearest loops, then 4 d. c. on further loops, 4 d. c. on nearer loops. Before beginning the sweater it would be well for one to make a small sample of these different patterns, then a choice can be made and by so doing one will also become familiar with the work. As the directions for this sweater are given in blocks, either of the patterns mentioned can be used in following them.

Back of Sweater

Of any pattern of stitches used make 21 rows of 30 blks. following directions for first two rows.

22nd row.—Drop one half blk., that is turn without working over last 2 sts., either a x d. of 2 d. c. in the previous row, ch. 3, turn. (29½ blks.)

23rd row.—Drop one half blk. (29 blks.)

24th row.—Drop one half blk. (28½ blks.)

Now by dropping one half block at a time make the rows as follows:

25th row.—28 blks.
26th row.—27½
27th and 28th rows.—27 blks.
29th row.—26½ blks.
30th row.—26 blks.
31st row.—25½ blks.
32nd row.—25 blks.
33rd row.—24½ blks.
34th row.—24 blks.
35th row.—23½ blks.
36th and 37th row.—23 blks.
38th row.—22½ blks.
39th row.—22 blks.
40th row.—Drop 1 blk. each end leaving 20 blks.

CROCHETED COAT SWEATER.

17 more rows of 20 blks. each.

This completes the back, break wool.

For each front start at the bottom with 14 blocks.

20th row.—14 blks.
21st row.—13½ blks.
22nd to 30th rows.—13 blks.
31st row.—12½ blks.
32nd to 34th rows.—12 blks.
35th row.—11½ blks.
36th and 37th rows.—11 blks.
38th row.—10½ blks.
39th row.—10 blks.

Now tie a white thread into the edge of the work on which one has decreased or dropped stitches. Next 10 rows 10 blks each, next or

50th row.—Drop one half blk. on the edge opposite white thread. (9½ blks.)

51st row.—Drop one half blk. (9 blks.)

52nd row.—8½ blks.
53rd row.—8 blks.

55th, 56th, 57th rows.—7 blks. each. Break thread.

After both fronts are finished, join 7 blks. on each shoulder, to 7 blks. on the back, leaving 6 blks. in center back for neck. The seams are stronger if done on the wrong side, slip stitching through each stitch. To do this hold edges even, right sides together, run hook under both loops of a st. of each edge, draw a loop through and through the loop on the hook also, in joining seams under the arms slip st. in same way excepting where half blks. are dropped, by working a few stitches of single crochet here, the line can be evened up a little. Care should be taken on this seam to join row to row as nearly as possible.

Border

In making the first row of the border work at least 3 singles in end of each rows, more if necessary, the work should not be at all tight or when the border is finished the body of the sweater will be puckered. One should also be careful not to work this first row simply over the end doubles of the rows, but into different stitches, drawing in different loops here and there to fill any holes. S. c. completely around to the opposite side, around the bottom working under the 2 threads, 1 s. c. in each st., 3 s. c. in each corner st., ch. 1, turn at top of opposite front.

CROCHETED WING. FIG. 1.

2nd row.—Skip 2 s. c., 1 s. c. in each st., working through both loops, 3 s. c. in center st. in corners, skip next to last st., 1 s. c. in last, ch. 1, turn.

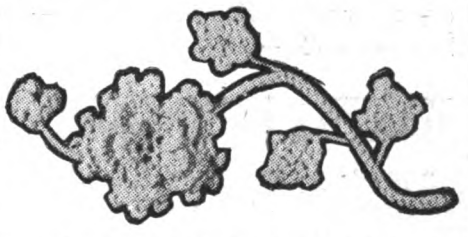
3rd row.—Skip 2 s. c., 1 s. c. in each st. 3 s. c. in corners. The slant of the border on each front should be a continuation of the line from the shoulder. To get this 1, 2 or 3 stitches may have to be skipped in each row according to how one works. Make 8 rows. In 9th row mark places and number of buttonholes, for these simply ch. 7, skip 7 leaving the same number of stitches between each button. 9 more rows complete border.

Sleeves

These should be made to fit a pattern the size and length of sleeve needed. Begin at top with 20 or more blocks and graduate down to 12 blocks at wrist, make rather short to allow for stretching. Border with white wool in single crochet turning at end of each row and then seaming up. Make 18 rows deep, if one desires a turn back-cuff as shown.

Collar

This is also of white and should be made to fit a pattern.



For collar shown begin with ch. 71 sts., turn, 70 s. c.

Make 44 rows in all, then the fronts are graduated off to fit the neck of the sweater on the inside each and rows kept even on the outside, by always turning with ch. 1. Exact directions can not be given but the following will be somewhat of a guide and more stitches can be added, if the work does not fit.

45th row.—30 sts. from outside edge, turn, skip 1, 29 sts., turn, skip 1, 26 sts., 23 sts., 21, 19, 17, graduating down to 9 or 10 sts., as one nears the point of the collar. S. c. around neck of collar before slip stitching or sewing to sweater.

Belt and Buttons

The belt is of 14 rows s. c. to match border. Wooden button molds covered with crochet have centers to match sweater with edge and under side of white, ch. 4 join in ring, s. c. round and round until size of mold is most covered, join in white and finish.

Pockets

Seven blocks wide or a good size is 5 x 6 inches, finished with 1½ border, s. c. all around these, before sewing in place.

Angora Muffler and Cap

Materials required. For muffler, 12 half ounce balls angora wool. Bone knitting needles No. 3. Cast on 50 stitches and knit in plain garter stitch until scarf is yard and a half long. Finish the ends with a tied-in fringe of wool.

EIDER-DOWN CAP TRIMMED WITH CROCHETED ROSES AND LEAVES.

Skating Cap

For this one will need 9 half ounce balls angora wool, No. 3 needles cast on 160 stitches, knit plain until work is about 12 inches long. Sew the side edges of the knitting together to form cap, gather the top stitches up close and finish with a large full pompom of the wool.

The left side is trimmed with a crocheted wing of white zephyr edged with old rose wool and finished off at the base of the wing with a smaller pompom of the angora wool.

Directions for Wool Wing

The wool wing which decorates the side of the cap is shown in detail (Fig 1).

It can be made of either the double eider-down Germantown or heavier wool.

Begin with ch. 18, turn, 16 s. c., ch. 1, turn, 7 s. c., 3 s. c. in next st., 8 s. c., worked through only the further loop of each st. to give the ribbed effect.

Ch. 7, turn. 6 s. c. on ch., 1 s. c. on each s. c., 3 s. c. in center, 7 s. c., ch. 8, turn, 7 s. c. on ch., s. c. on s. c. always making 3 s. c. in center st., ch. 8, turn, s. c. to end, ch. 7, turn, s. c. to end, ch. 8, turn, s. c. to end ch. 1, s. c. to end, ch. 9, turn, s. c. to within 6 stitches of end, ch. 1, turn, s. c., ch. 6, turn, s. c. to within 5 stitches of end. The two extreme points of the wing now having been completed, continue to work in this way, decreasing only a couple of stitches on the short side of wing, on long side graduate off by only working to within 5 or 6 sts. of previous row, every second row. Work back and forth until about 24 rows are complete. Then outline with colored wool by slip stitch and making 1 s. c. into second row of work every 5th st. Two wings of equal size are also used on caps, for a front trimming fastened in place with 3 crochet covered buttons to match edge of wings.

Crocheted Flowers

Wool flowers of the most brilliant hues, combined with foliage in natural colors, are the latest development in artificial flower making. Wool, velvet, felt and fur hats are all equally fascinating trimmed in this way. The work is not tedious, as wool works up quickly into the conventional designs, such as buckles, bands and rosettes, and even a running design of flowers and leaves such as is here shown can be fashioned very readily by any worker who is somewhat experienced.

Applique wool flowers such as decorate the eider-down cap and scarf set are very effective. The flowers and leaves, if leaves are used, are made separately and then sewed in place.

In this set the roses were of dull pink and leaves a dark bottle green.

To Make Roses

Ch. 4, join in ring, 1 s. c., 1 d. c., 2 tr. c., 1 d. c., 1 s. c., 1 d. c., 2 tr. c., 1 d. c., 1 s. c., 1 d. c., 2 tr. c., 1 d. c., 1 s. c., 1 d. c., 2 tr. c., 1 d. c., all in ring. Fasten off and break thread.

The leaves of green wool ch. 7, 1 d. c. in 6th st., 1 d. c. in each next 2 sts., 2 d. c. in next st., 2 d. c., ch. 3 for picot, 2 d. c. in the end st. of ch., 2 d. c. in next st., 3 d. c. in next 3 sts., 1 s. c., draw up closely and break thread.

Sew leaves in place, putting rose in center, then thread coarse needle with white wool and from the center out make three long stitches on each petal.

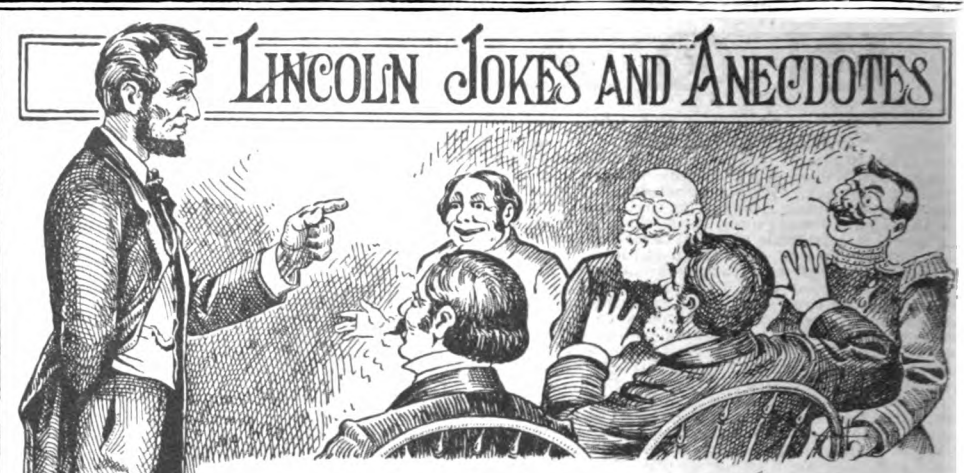
Lincoln As a Trial Lawyer

President Lincoln was very clever at catching an adversary. One time in court he asked gravely: "I want to know if I may ask the honorable gentleman a question?"



Permission being given, he asked the attorney for the prosecution:

"If three chickens were sitting on a rail fence, and you shot one off that rail, how many would remain?"

The lawyer with a grin replied:

"Two of course."

"No, there wouldn't, for the noise made by your gun would frighten the other two away, and so it is with your case against my client. The noise of your argument has driven away all proof of his guilt." Mr. Lincoln's client was acquitted.

LINCOLN JOKES AND ANECDOTES

Tells of Making Lincoln's Wedding Shirts

A HISTORIC event occurred very recently for the woman who made Abraham Lincoln's wedding shirts celebrated her ninety-second birthday. And part of the celebration was the telling of this important episode of the shirts.

"Eighty years ago there were no sewing machines. We sewed by hand by the light of a sputtering candle," said Mrs. Anna Seaman. "My mother was Mrs. Elizabeth McDaniel. Abraham Lincoln called her Aunty McDaniel. One day he came to our house with a large bundle of muslin. He sat by the fireside and watched the log blaze.

"'Aunty McDaniel,' he said, 'I want you to make me a half dozen day shirts and four night shirts.'

"'Why, are you going to marry, Abe?' my mother inquired.

"'Well, one can't tell what a young man might do,' he said.

"So I helped my mother make the shirts. We sewed three weeks on the shirts and two weeks on the night shirts. Some of the shirts had as many as forty plaits down the bosom, but Abraham Lincoln was very plain. We charged a dollar apiece for making the shirts, which were for Lincoln's wedding to Miss Mary Todd."

Rescues a Mired Pig

Lincoln could not stand to see an animal in pain or distress. Once while riding along on the eighty circuit of Illinois, he and his companions were highly amused at the plight of a pig which was stuck in the mud and squealing loudly. Though they all were hilarious at its antics, Lincoln could not stand to go off and leave the the animal helpless, and in spite of the jeers and protests of his companions he went to the pig's rescue and pulled it out, saying:

"If that farmer lost his pig, the poor little children might have to go barefoot all winter."

Lincoln and His Stepmother

Uncle Joe Cannon's memories of Lincoln are replete with incidents. The last time he saw Mr. Lincoln was on a train just before his inauguration. He heard a man in the crowd ask the question:

"Abe be you going down to see your mother?"

The answer came quickly:

"I am going to spend a day visiting her before I go to Washington to take the oath of office."

Mr. Lincoln referred to his stepmother to whom he was devoted. This was the last time he ever saw her.

Only Cut Her Own Finger

General Horace Porter says of Lincoln he did not tell a story for the sake of anecdote, but to point a moral, or to drive home a fact. In discussing England's assistance to the South and how after the collapse of the Confederacy, England would find she had aided but little and only injured herself, he said:

"'That reminds me of a barber in Sangamon county. He had just gone to bed when a stranger roused him, announcing that he must be shaved, that he had a four-day-old beard, was going to a ball and that he must have it removed. Well, the barber got up reluctantly, dressed and fixed the man in his chair with a back so low that every time he bore down on him he came near dislocating his neck. He lathered the man's face, nose, eyes and ears, stropped his razor on his boot and dived at the man's face as if he were about to mow a stubble field. He made a bold swath across the right cheek, carrying away the beard, a pimple and two warts. The man's cheeks were so hollow that the barber conceived the idea of sticking his finger into the man's mouth to press out the cheeks. Finally he cut through the cheek and into his own finger. He pulled out the finger, flipped off the blood and glared at his victim and said: "There, you lantern-jawed cuss you've made me cut my finger.'"

"'Now,' said Mr. Lincoln, 'England will find that she got the South into a pretty bad scrape by trying to administer to her and in the end she will find she has only cut her own finger.'"

Lincoln Autograph

In the Library of Congress there is a very small collection of Lincoln autographs but among them are two interesting papers in President Lincoln's own handwriting. One of them is part of his last message to Congress which was certified to by the late John Defrees, who was the Public Printer at that time. It reads as follows:

"If the people should, by whatever mode or means, make it an Executive duty to re-enslave such persons, another, not I must be their instrument.

"In stating a single condition of peace, I mean simply to say that the war will cease on the part of the government whenever it shall have ceased on the part of those who began it."

Courtesy to an Old Woman

After his election to the Presidency, an old woman whom he called "Aunt Sally" came from New Salem to say good by to "Abe" before he started for Washington to be President. He was standing in the room placed at his disposal in the old state capitol talking with a couple of men of national renown when the old woman entered, visibly embarrassed. He saw her at once and walked across the room to meet her. Taking both her hands in his he led her to the seat of honor and presented his distinguished visitors to her, putting her quite at ease by saying:

"Gentlemen this is a good old friend of mine. She can make the best flapjacks you ever tasted, for she has baked them for me many a time."

A Lincoln Story

During the Civil War, Colonel Archibald Alexander of Kentucky, went on to Washington, to consult Lincoln, about getting up a regiment of Union soldiers from Kentucky. There had been none up to that time.

Reaching Washington, he went up to the President's office, and took his seat among the large crowd waiting in the ante-room, to be heard for one cause or another. When his turn came to go in to see the President, he said to Mr. Lincoln:

"I don't think you have as easy a job here, as some people might think. It reminds me of the story of an Irishman.

"The Irishman had moved into a new village, and soon made himself very obnoxious to the people, and they determined to get rid of him, and so rode him out of town on a rail.

"Some one meeting Tim, asked him how he liked his ride.

"He replied, 'Begorra, if it wasn't for the honor of the thing, I'd rather go a fut.'"

Mr. Lincoln burst into a loud laugh, and said: "Come into the other room, and tell the story, to Stanton."

He retold the story, and Stanton seemed to enjoy it as much as Lincoln. The Colonel got his commission, returned to Kentucky, and raised a regiment, the first from that state, as the records show.

Misapplied Philanthropy

President Lincoln often went to Judiciary Square to visit the big hospital there. Upon one occasion he and his party noticed a lady just ahead of them going through the wards, passing out tracts from a large bundle which she carried. She seemed to hand them out without looking at them. A wounded soldier received one and as he read its title he burst out laughing. The President mildly reproved him, saying:

"I wouldn't do that, when I was a boy, I received a tract that has helped me through life."

The soldier held up the leaflet and said, "But you would laugh at this one, Mr. Lincoln, it is called 'The Sin of Dancing,' and both my legs have been cut off at the knees."

The President then joined heartily in the soldier's laughter. "Mr. Johnson," the President remarked to his companion, "this is good evidence of misapplied philanthrophy."

To the Mother of Five Soldier Boys

Cleveland boasts of a family that holds revered memories of the martyred President Lincoln. There were five brothers, all of them young men, in the Federal army during the war, and one of them, a youth of nineteen, after a particularly fierce campaign found himself laid up in a Washington military hospital.

As he was in a pretty bad way his mother came on from her home in Cleveland to look after him. After he had managed to pass the crisis of his illness and when he was able to be moved, his mother went to the White House to see the President to ask his discharge from the army. She had no letters of introduction, no one to use influence to aid her, but she did not need them. Her simple story was sufficient. She saw the President, and in his kindly way he questioned her. She told him all about her five soldier boys and when she had finished her story, Mr. Lincoln stepped to his desk and wrote an order for the young soldier's discharge.

"Take that madam," he said, "and get your boy. Then bring him here to me. I want to talk with him."

But Mr. Lincoln had not finished with his visitor. He gave an order to a secretary, the White House carriage was sent for and the young man's mother was driven to the hospital. Then she and the convalescent soldier rode back to the White House where they dined. Later on the President handed the mother two railroad tickets to Cleveland and a document stating that it was his (Abraham Lincoln's wish that the young soldier be given a position in the government service whenever he desired it. Later on the young man got a position in the United States Treasury department at Washington which he held for more than a quarter of a century.

The COMFORT Sisters' Corner

This Department is conducted solely for the use of COMFORT sisters, whereby they may give expression to their ideas relative to the home and home surroundings, and to all matters pertaining to themselves and families; as well as opening a way for personal correspondence between each other.

Our object is to extend a helping hand to COMFORT subscribers; to become coworkers with all who seek friendship, encouragement, sympathy or assistance through the interchange of ideas.

Any abuse of this privilege, such as inviting correspondence for the purpose of offering an article for sale, or undertaking to charge a sum of money for ideas, recipes or information mentioned in any letter appearing in this department, if reported, will result in the offender being denied the use of these columns.

Do not ask us to publish letters requesting money contributions or donations of any sort. Much as we sympathize with the suffering and unfortunate, it is impossible to do this as we would be flooded with similar requests.

Do not request souvenir postals unless you have complied with the conditions which entitles you to such a notice. See postal request notice in another column.

We cordially invite mothers and daughters of all ages to write to COMFORT Sisters' Corner. Every letter will be carefully read and considered, and then the most helpful ones chosen for publication, whether the writer be an old or new subscriber.

Please write only on one side of the paper, and recipes on a separate sheet.

Always give your correct and full name and address, very plainly written; otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

Address all letters for this department to MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, CARE COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

WE have often heard the remark, "If only I had my life to live over I would live it so differently." But since that is impossible why waste breath on such idle speeches when you can't undo the things you have done in the past. But you can start now and live the remaining years of your life so that you will never again want to say that you would live your life differently if you could only live it over again. If you have only a few years, or even a few days, to stay on this earth, you can make someone happy, you can cheer some sad soul. If you make them happy for only a few minutes you will have made life's burden lighter for them. You don't need to make a man or woman rich to make them happy for riches do not bring happiness. You can make mistakes in about everything else but in making someone happy so if you are really sorry for your past, start now and make good.—Constant Moore.

The above letter from an Arkansas sister impressed me so much and seemed so helpful and encouraging that I am glad to share it with you, and particularly do I hope its message will reach some discouraged sister or brother and bid her or him "Start Now."—Ed.

DEAR COMFORT READERS:

I am sending in a list of subscribers of which one half is to be applied on the Uncle Charlie Home Fund.

I see by the November COMFORT that of COMFORT's family of six million readers, two hundred of them have sent in $230.00 in subs. and donations. That nearly took my breath away.

November fifth, Billy Sunday finished eight weeks' meetings in Detroit and on the last day the collections amounted to over $46,000, and before that the people of Detroit had given him an $8,000 automobile. And they also gave over $45,000 in other collections to pay the expenses of the meetings, so in all, they gave about $100,000 for eight weeks' work. I am not saying that Mr. Sunday did not earn his share of the money but he certainly got it anyway and the people of Detroit gave it to him gladly of their own free will.

Now if one city will give all that money to one man for eight weeks' work, why cannot six millions of the best people on earth raise enough to buy Uncle Charlie a modest but comfortable home to show their appreciation for his fourteen years' work for us, and with him lying on a bed of suffering all that time. Not one in a million in his condition would think they could do anything.

I have read hundreds of letters in COMFORT, many, many of them lovely Christian letters and most of them telling how much the writers loved and admired Uncle Charlie for his untiring work in the behalf of sick, sinful and ignorant humanity.

Now, sisters, cousins, brothers all, I motion that we make less flowery speeches and do more real work that we may prove our words by our deeds.

If all who are perfectly able to do so would only give him ten cents (of course the more the better) or get one or two subs. to COMFORT, Uncle Charlie could have his home in a hurry and none of us would ever feel the little we had done.

Now I make another motion, that we who are able to do and don't do, hold our tongues forevermore and never tell or write how we admire Uncle Charlie.

So, let's get busy and do something at once while Uncle Charlie is still with us. Post-mortem flowers are no good. They cast no fragrance backward over the life of the one who is forever still. So let's give out flowers to Uncle Charlie now while he can enjoy them. Let's show him that the hearts of COMFORT's millions are in the right place and that we can do as much for him for fourteen years' work as Detroit did for Billy Sunday for eight weeks' work. If we won't do this we don't deserve to be called sisters, brothers, cousins or Christians.

Now let's do our part or hereafter hang our heads in shame and keep still.

I want to thank Mr. Gannett for his interest and the liberal commission he is giving on all subs. to help the Home Fund. MRS. C. S.

Mrs. C. S. You must have heard the far-famed Billy Sunday preach for you seem to have acquired his method of dealing solar plexus blows at unrelenting and, worse still, unremitting, sisters, brothers and cousins who profess to admire Uncle Charlie very much but who fail to make substantial proof of their admiration. We thank you.—Ed.

DEER ISLAND, OREGON.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS, ONE AND ALL:

In reading the October number of COMFORT I feel impelled to answer some of the sisters' letters.

A. B. has my heartfelt sympathy though I never experienced her feelings as my mother was and is one of the best.

I think Mrs. C. Smith is mistaken when she says no one not having gone through the horror of an unhappy marriage can realize it. I have not, but I have known so many cases of the kind and moreover my childhood was spent in a home of trouble and therefore I realize it too well. I think that a woman who lives with a man as his wife when she is unloved and unloving, is a prostitute in the sight of God. I disagree with her and agree with Mrs. Clyde Jones that there are as many happy marriages contracted in youth as in middle age. I was married when but seventeen years old and there are few more happy unions than ours. I agree with Mrs. Clyde Jones in that a woman should never let a man know she is "a fool over him," but, on the other hand, I know a man who was married to a woman who did not believe in letting him know she loved him and consequently he neglected her in turn. They lived together but a few months and then were divorced. He is married now to a woman who believes in letting him know she married him for love and while he is not a demonstrative man he enjoys being petted, though married to No. 2 nearly ten years.

What do the sisters think about the difference in the age of husband and wife? I know of cases where there are as many as eighteen years' difference and they are perfectly happy though in one case I know of, the man cares only to stay at home and the wife likes to enjoy life among people, so often he goes just to please her. My husband is ten years my senior but as young in spirit as I am.

Sister Pearl Whitt, will you please send in "The Devil's Soliloquy" in full? I think it fine.

As for suffrage; I have lived the greater part of my life where many men are employed, men of the laboring and business class, and have known doctors, lawyers, teachers, etc., and among them are only two or three who thought "women were too good to vote." The majority of men are afraid to have women vote because they know they will have to give up much of their licentious pleasures, such as white slave dens, gambling and drinking and women will surely abolish them though it will take years and years because people in general are so corrupt. For instance, look at Oregon and Washington (I speak of them especially because I have lived there and know.) Adherents of the "drys" and the "wets" had fought for years, but not until the women got the vote did the "drys" win and then liquor was gone. Of course there is bootlegging, but a woman can now pass along the street without flushing with shame at overhearing profane and vile remarks and insults cast in all directions by drunkards. A few years back she had to stand all these things and so did her children. Is it any wonder the present generation is degraded generally when it had to live in such an atmosphere? Who brought about this change? Women, of course, and where liquor is abolished the white slave dens and gambling dens cannot flourish so well and in their turn will also be abolished. Some women, I'll admit, would be as bad at grafting and greed as the present conditions show the men to be. But, dear Miss Whitt, there is one weak place in your argument: If you feel that women are so good and so far above the men, why need you ask if Universal Suffrage would abolish graft, greed, selfishness and the mighty evils that do indeed shake the foundations of our Nation, and cause so many to be non-patriotic? Though it is true that some women invite insults by their immodest dress, is that any reason why the laws protecting real women should be repealed? I am a firm advocate of Suffrage but not the militant kind and I agree with you when you say no real woman will countenance that. You quote Uncle Charlie so much. Allow me to suggest that you read some of his sermons in back numbers of COMFORT on the Suffrage question. Many women are moral cowards and therefore afraid to express their convictions by voting for fear of condemnation from those who do not believe as they do.

I also believe motherhood is a duty and a blessed privilege but I also believe in birth control as two, three or four children are all that the average working man can support, to say nothing of education, and where there are so many children the mother cannot properly train them and educate them for some work, for work most of them must or starve. Another thing, two thirds of the half million women and girls in dens of vice in this country, and New York especially, are recruited from families of nine or more for the reason they either know no better or cannot support themselves because of the above reasons. Few of our great men of history came from large families. Women with small children cannot hold office and be fair to their children but those whose children are grown or who have not been blessed with any, are as capable as

SO many times in the making of croquettes the mixture is not firm enough to handle and to remedy this and make it mold easily, soak a tablespoonful of granulated gelatine in a little cold water and dissolve in boiling water, using as small a quantity of water as possible. Stir this into the croquette mixture and set in a cool place till the gelatine has had time to harden. Then shape and fry in the usual manner. The heat of frying melts the gelatine so that it cannot be detected, unless perhaps the croquettes are a little better than usual.—Ed.

SQUASH SOUP.—One half cup cooked squash, one pint milk, two slices of onion, one tablespoon of butter, two tablespoons of flour, salt and pepper to taste. Rub the squash through a sieve. Scald the milk with the onion and add to squash. Season and blend with flour and butter.—Ed.

HARLEQUIN SALAD.—Peel and chop fine cold boiled potatoes, add to them finely chopped boiled chicken, the proportions being equal. Sprinkle them with salt and pepper, and place them in a head of lettuce where the heart has been taken out. Pour over them a salad dressing made of one teaspoon of mustard, a tiny pinch of salt, the beaten yolks of two eggs, melted butter the size of an egg, one can of condensed milk, two thirds of a cup of vinegar, adding lastly the beaten whites of the egg. Serve it with rings of toast arranged around the outside of the lettuce.

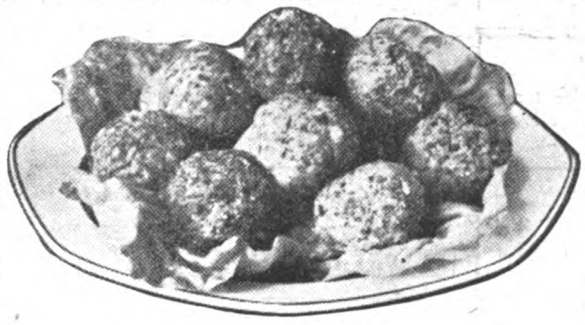
MARY H. NORTHEND, Salem, Mass.

TOMATO AND CELERY SALAD.—One can solid tomatoes, one cup chopped celery, one large chopped onion, two hard-boiled eggs, one half teaspoon mustard, salt, pepper, paprika and vinegar to taste. Mix the tomatoes, celery, onion, and chopped egg whites together. Rub the mustard and egg-yolks until smooth with a little vinegar and add to the salad. Then add other ingredients to taste. This should be kept in a cold place for several hours before using, so the various flavors blend. It is better the next day after making.

MRS. X. Y. Z., Idaho.

HOMINY.—Shell a gallon of large grained, white corn; put in an enameled dinner pot, cover with water in which three tablespoons of baking soda has been dissolved. Let this soak over night; in the morning put on a hot fire and let boil two and one half or three hours, or until the husks are all loose and will slip easily from the grain. Now drain off all soda water. Put corn in a large dishpan and wash in several waters until the husks are all washed out. Then put back on the stove and boil a few minutes each in three or four waters. Drain all water from it, mix in a little salt and put away in a stone jar. Use when preferred.

MISS MARY BROWN, Branon, Texas.



CREAMED TURNIPS.—Pare the turnips, cut in small pieces and boil in plenty of hot salted water. When done drain in a colander and put into a pan or dish. Put one teaspoon of butter in a small saucepan, and when hot add a level teaspoon of flour; stir till smooth, but not brown; add half a pint of milk and stir until it boils; add half a teaspoon of salt and pour over the turnips.

MISS MARY BROWN, Branon, Texas.

BAKED SALMON.—Clean the fish, rinse it and wipe dry, rubbing well inside and out with pepper and salt and fill with a stuffing made of bread, a small amount of butter and season with sage or thyme; tie a thread around the fish to keep the stuffing from coming out and place in pan to bake. Sprinkle first with pieces of butter and dredge with flour, and put a pint of hot water in the pan to baste with. Bake one hour, or till the fish is done. This will depend on the size of the fish and the heat of the oven. Serve with mashed potatoes, with slices of lemon placed on fish.—Ed.

SALMON CUTLETS.—Mix leftover salmon with white sauce and set away to cool. When cool, cut into strips and shape into oval, chop-shaped pieces and roll in cracker crumbs. Let dry and fry in hot fat till a golden brown. Serve with peas.—Ed.

SALMON FISH BALLS.—Use an equal amount of freshly steamed salmon and freshly boiled potatoes. If the salmon must be boiled, boil salmon and potatoes together in just enough water to cover and very slowly. Mash the potato and pick up the fish with a fork.

SALMON FISH BALLS.

Mix together with pepper; salt and butter enough to season, and hot milk or cream to shape into balls. Try out slices of salt fat pork and fry balls in the fat, using it very hot. Serve balls on lettuce leaves with the slices of salt pork.

BAKED SQUASH.—Cut medium-sized squash through center, scrape out all seeds, then fill squash with fried sausage, seasoned. Fasten the two halves together with small pieces of wood and bake for two hours in hot oven, turning squash occasionally.

MRS. J. W. DIKEMAN, Ft. Morgan, Colo.

SOUR MILK BISCUIT.—Thoroughly sift one quart of flour and rub into it a piece of butter the size of an egg, add a teaspoon of salt and stir in a pint of sour-milk in which one teaspoon of soda has been dissolved. Get it in shape quickly, kneading as little as possible, roll about half an inch thick, cut with a biscuit cutter and bake in a quick oven.

MRS. WILLIAM GARDINIER, Youngstown, Ohio.

CANNED PEACHES SERVED WITH RICE.—Cook a quarter of a pound of rice in three cups of milk, with a pinch of salt. When tender and while very moist add a tablespoon of Granulated Sparkling Gelatine dissolved in two tablespoons of boiling water, and three tablespoons of sugar. When cooked and beginning to stiffen, stir in a cup of whipped cream. Serve in ring form with peaches in center.

MRS. E. L. B., Norwich, N. Dak.

Beat one egg light, add one half cup sweet milk, then sour milk and soda and stir in all dry ingredients. Melt two tablespoons butter in a small frying pan, shaking it to get the butter distributed evenly over the surface, turn in the mixture, then pour in one half cup sweet milk but do not stir it in. Bake twenty-five minutes and cut in triangles.

closely together by the association of these trinkets. Scarcely a stage of his life or an event in his career with its early hardships, privations and disappointments but is recalled by some homely little memento. From childhood to old age, as son, lover, husband, citizen, soldier, statesman and friend, his life is intimately revealed by these aged, time-worn, battle-scarred relics.

Here may be seen his white wedding gloves, on either side of the apron, and beneath his farm spurs, to the right his pruning knife and a black glove worn at his mother's funeral, his compass, bleeding and cupping instruments, a piece of sealing wax taken from his desk after death, and the last used by him before his death; a boot strap or garter worn by him at Braddock's defeat, a button cut from the coat worn at his first inauguration, also a button and piece of canvas from his army tent used during the Revolutionary War; a medallion given to him as the founder of the free schools in Alexandria, Va., by D. Eggleston Lancaster, Esq., the founder of the free schools in England his medicine scales and several other minor articles. But of them all the chief interest centers around the little pearl handled pocket-knife, which was a gift from his mother, when he was a mere boy, and which he carried constantly for fifty-six years, for this tiny boyish trinket is given credit for having kept him in the tortuous road to duty when his mind had been definitely set upon his stepping out of military life into more profitable and comfortable tasks. This same circumstance is claimed to have literally changed the map of the world.

Washington was obliged to relinquish his boyhood dream of being a midshipman in the British navy after his mother had already given her permission and his commission had been obtained. He gave up this hope that had been fraught with so much anticipation, with respectful and unquestioned obedience, but he returned to his studies of surveying with the deepest of despair. She apparently expected nothing less and merely considered his obedience to her decision as a matter of course and in keeping with her idea of filial duty. Yet she appreciated his disappointment and when her next order went to England for household supplies, the list included a good penkife. Upon its arrival she presented it to her young son with this injunction: "Always obey your superiors."

All through life he carried the little pocket-knife and upon one occasion he showed it to General Knox, relating the story and his mother's command. Years afterward at Valley Forge, when discouraged and desperate over the attitude of Congress and the pitiable plight of his soldiers, he wrote his resignation and summoned the members of his staff to notify them of his action. Among the officers of the council was General Knox who labored earnestly to dissuade the General, but failed utterly to move him until the story of the penknife came to his mind and, regarding it as an inspiration, reminded the disheartened commander of his mother's injunction, repeating her words: "Always obey your superiors," and adding, so tradition claims, "You were commanded to lead this army and no one has ordered you to cease leading it." The words had the effect of making Washington pause and after a time he tore up the resignation and determined to fight on to the end. Upon the associations of the little humble penknife with its far-reaching influence of early discipline hung for a brief moment, the fate of the starving, shivering army and likewise the future of this nation.

The Kingdom of Our Birthright

In running this series we are not advocating belief in astrology or faith in the pretended talismanic charm of birth-stones, although these beliefs have persisted from remote antiquity and have not a few devotees even in this present age of reason. Yet as myths and superstitions that have dominated through the ages they possess historic interest and educational value. Miss March will appear with a pleasing message next month.—EDITOR.

THE sign of the Zodiac, Pisces, influences persons born between February 19th and March 22nd, and the study of mental philosophy is of great interest to them. A strong sense of independence makes them desire to earn what they possess, and to make themselves appreciated through persistency and fidelity to the trusts confided in them. They seek knowledge from every available source and have good memories. Study of self is their great need, for they are often endowed with marked ability in some particular direction, but are slow to recognize and improve opportunity from lack of self-confidence, which may prevent them from pressing forward when the height of their ambition is nearly reached, for they will be anxious and fearful of failure, and imagine that fate is against them, but when once they are aware of their power, they will succeed in all they undertake. Men born between these dates should choose self-reliant people as their friends and business associates. To these persons, giving is a delight, and their charities are many and to outsiders unknown. They are keenly sensitive to the feelings of others, and their manner of giving shows their true character. They should marry women of kind, even disposition, who will reason well, but not be too self-assertive.

In childhood they must have the right start in life, for they are very likely to stick to whatever they embark on. Punctuality and the necessity of keeping promises should early be taught. Parents must never break faith with them through acts inconsistent with their teachings.

Women born under this sign have a fine, artistic nature, an unusual quickness of perception, and will succeed in any line that interests their mentality. They will be of good disposition and kind to the poor. Love of luxury and self-indulgence are liable to prove their undoing, unless controlled by their innate conscientiousness and thoughtful tendencies. A prodigal use of time may result in unpleasant domestic conditions.

May all who read, value every word of the following quotation:

"Lost, yesterday, somewhere between sunrise and sunset, two golden hours, each set with sixty diamond minutes. No reward is offered, for they are gone forever!"

The Magic Influence Imputed to the Amethyst, the February Birth-Stone

In steps Miss February to hail the return of Saint Valentine, whose deeds of love and charity have endeared him to all the world, and caused his birthday, February 14th, to be set apart as sacred to his memory.

The legend of Saint Valentine's life is beautiful, marked by self sacrifice and fidelity to duty. Called the Patron Saint of Lovers, he suffered martyrdom for marrying love-lorn couples secretly, in defiance of the Imperial Edict.

Symbolic of pure love is the amethyst, and men and women born in February will do well to wear this stone as a continual reminder of its significance, and thus make their lives more purposeful. Sarah Bernhardt, now called "The Immortal," gives the following recipe for keeping off old age: "Love people, love life, love work and you will never grow old. I love, and am loved. I work incessantly, and therefore I am young at seventy-two years of age."

How to Make Miss February

Those celebrating Saint Valentine's day may find a description of Miss February useful. Use a store doll or make one by putting a stuffed head and arms on top of bottle. Use water colors for the face and tint the arms pink. Make dress of red crepe paper, using white for the skirt and waist trimming. Cut white paper hearts and decorate skirt, using crossed hearts with an arrow interwoven at center-front. Also use a large heart across front of waist. Make a cocked red crepe paper hat, and on the front paste two white hearts with a white arrow piercing them. Cut a cupid from stiff cardboard and attach to stick which is held across the right arm.

Alexandria and No. 22 fall in line with Mt. Vernon as a mecca for touring Masons. Though the original lodge room was destroyed by fire many years ago quite a goodly number of the valuable relics were saved and a few pieces of the original furniture. When the city hall was built the exact spot was reserved for the use of the lodge upon which had been located the original council chamber. The old treasures were restored, more added and the room has gradually taken on the very aspect that has been the aim and hope of the devotees of the craft. It does not impress the visitor other than as a memorial hall, which is as it should be in view of the fact that the Masonic fraternity of the United States is deep in the plans for erecting upon this very site a memorial to Washington the Mason, which shall be a National affair and which shall endure to the end of time. In it it is proposed to have deposited in a fireproof respository, a hall of fame, the treasured relics and time-honored souvenirs of the life of the Father of His Country which have been safeguarded so reverently throughout the last hundred years. There they will be safe from the touch of the vandal and secure from the ravages of time and the elements to remain for the benefit of posterity and for the adulation of generations of Masons yet to come.

While the majority of people know that General Washington died at Mt. Vernon at twenty minutes after ten on the night of Saturday, December 14, 1799 and that his body was deposited in the Old Tomb at a few minutes past three o'clock on Wednesday, December 18th, there are many who do not know that he was interred with Masonic ceremonies.

The old minutes of Lodge No. "22" has an account of this historic event.

In attendance at the bedside of the General during his last illness and when he expired were three physicians, Doctors Dick, Craik and Brown, the first two of whom were Masons and members of Washington's own lodge, No. "22." Doctor Dick being Master. On Monday, Dec. 16th, 1799, a funeral lodge was called with Doctor Dick presiding. Colonel George Deneale, senior warden pro tem, and Colonel Dennis Ramsey, junior warden protem. At this meeting the plan of the services was arranged and early on the morning of Wednesday, December 18th, the lodge and visiting brethren, under escort of the militia and citizens of Alexandria, started for Mount Vernon, where they arrived about 1 P. M.

The funeral procession moved in the following order: First the troops, horse and foot; next the clergy, Reverends James Muir, Thomas Davis, William Maffit and William Addison, the first three of these being members of No. "22," the General's horse with saddle, holsters and pistols, led by two grooms, Cyrus and Wilson; music; guard of honor; then the bier, borne by four young lieutenants of the 106th Regiment Virginia Militia, namely Lawrence Hooff, Jr., James Turner, George Wise and William Moss; pall bearers, Colonels Charles Simms, Dennis Ramsey, William Payne, George Gilpin, Charles Little, and Philip Marstella, all Revolutionary officers, Masons and all members of No. "22" except Colonel Marstella, who was not, but whose son, Philip was, and was present with the Lodge. Next came the mourners and then the Masons, in all seventy-nine. Colonel George Deneale, junior warden, commanding the troops, Captain Percey, senior warden, commanding his company, the "Alexandria Blues," Captain Young, a member, commanding the cavalry and Captain William Harper, also a member, the artillery. On arriving at the tomb, the services of the Episcopal church were performed by the Reverend Thomas Davis, Rector of Christ church, and member of the lodge, and the Masonic service by Doctor Elisha C. Dick, Worshipful Master of "22" assisted by Rev. James, Muir, Chaplain.

Black cows give white milk.

Truth is the sun of intelligence.

Man's extremity is God's opportunity.

Lean liberty is better than fat slavery.

Crows flock together; eagles fly alone.

Good sense is the master of human life.

Rum has drowned more men than the sea.

Deserve success and you may command it.

It is a joy to think the best of human kind.

Pride in prosperity turns to misery in adversity.

He is a wise man who can wear poverty decently.

A promise is a debt which we too often forget to pay.

A blush on the face is better than a blot on the heart.

Ignore small injuries and they will become none at all.

We easily forget our faults when nobody knows them.

What is money good for if it cannot buy contentment?

More have repented of talking too much than too little.

Hope, deceitful as it is, carries us agreeably through life.

Small minds usually condemn what is beyond their understanding.

Nature takes as much pains in forming a beggar as in forming a prince.

If a man empties his purse into his head, no one can take it from him.

There are more men who have missed opportunity than who have lacked it.

A man cannot leave a better legacy to the world than a well educated family.

To resort to drink for the ease of one's mind is to cure melancholy by madness.

No one ever did an intentional injury to another without doing a greater to himself.

A mother's a mother all the days of her life; a father's a father till he gets a new wife.

That happiness may enter the soul, we must first sweep it clean of all imaginary evils.

Our lives should be as pure as the snow fields where our footsteps leave a mark, but no stain.

It is a great misfortune not to have wit enough to speak well, or not enough judgment to keep silent.

The error of certain women is to imagine that to acquire distinction they must imitate the manners of men.

Though jealousy be produced by love, as ashes by fire, yet jealousy extinguishes love as ashes extinguish fire.

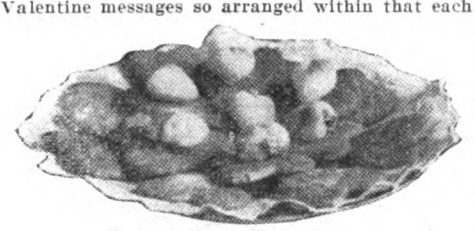
We drink at the spring of happiness from a broken pitcher—when it reaches our lips there is very little in it.

Every person has three characters; that which he exhibits, that which he has and that which he thinks he has.

An inquisitive person is a creature naturally vacant of thought and therefore compelled to seek outside assistance.

VALENTINE LUNCHEON PARTY

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.



YOUTH loves Saint Valentine, and old age recalls with a backward glance, that somewhere there is treasured a bold confession of adoration, told on a home-made valentine.

Saint Valentine lived many years ago, and because of his love and charity, February fourteenth was set aside as a festival day in his honor, and the custom has never diminished in popularity.

Shakespeare alludes to this day as being sacred to Saint Valentine, because it was then the birds began to mate, and thus arose, perhaps, the custom of sending sweet messages of love and affection on February fourteenth.

A valentine luncheon seems an ideal way to celebrate the occasion and the following ideas may be carried out with much merriment and small amount of labor.

Make a centerpiece of flowers or twine a heart-shaped piece of cardboard with green. On either side, stand a doll dressed in tissue paper holding an oblong box which is decorated with hearts and tiny envelopes, either done in water colors or cut out and pasted on. The cover of the box should be opened back against doll, and Valentine messages so arranged within that each will have a place by itself, thus avoiding any tangling when they are drawn out. To each message, attach a ribbon which is connected at the other end to a place card, which has the name of guest to be seated there written upon it. So when all are seated, each one will pull the ribbon attached to his or her place card, and out of the box will come a Valentine.

At intervals around centerpiece, place hearts with cupids peering over the tops, and keep them upright by pasting on an angle of cardboard. The wit and genius of Youth will be displayed on these cards in

"* * * jewels five words long
That on the stretch'd forefinger of all Time
Sparkle forever."

Serve Valentine Sandwiches, Cupid's Well, Heart's Desires, and Ginger Hearts, as described below, with a cold drink of equal parts of lemonade and ginger ale, also hot coffee and cocoa. A salad, plain bread and butter sandwiches and fruit will make the luncheon more elaborate.

Valentine Sandwiches

Season finely chopped chicken with salt, paprika and a little onion juice; add enough boiled salad dressing to moisten. Use for filling between buttered slices of white bread, and after sandwiches are made, cut into heart shapes. Garnish with stuffed olives cut in halves, lightly pressing the cut side onto the bread. Arrange on plate and decorate the edge with red paper hearts.

Cupid's Well

Cut four heart-shaped pieces from rich paste in graduating sizes, using the largest for the bottom—which should measure eight inches across. Cut the heart-shaped centers from the other three, leaving a rim one inch wide. Put all onto the whole bottom, the smallest at the top, and between each rub a very little white of egg so they will hold together, being careful that it does not run onto the edges. Chill and bake in a very hot oven twenty-five minutes, decreasing the heat the last ten minutes. Bake at the same time one of the heart centers.

PASTE.—Sift two cups of flour with one scant teaspoonful of salt, having mixing bowl and flour very cold. Chop into flour with a knife four tablespoonfuls of lard and five of butter, first chilling both. The flour and shortening should be of the consistency of dry meal. Wet with enough ice water to make a stiff dough, adding a little at a time and mixing with a knife. Butter must not be melted by using hands for mixing. Roll into three-cornered shape, bring corner toward center, fold once and roll out.

FILLING.—Boil two thirds cup of thin cream with two cups of granulated sugar until it threads. In a fine stream pour this onto the beaten whites of three eggs and beat till creamy. Add two cups of chopped dates and one third cup of chopped nuts. Let cool and fill just before serving. Cover the well with baked center and remove before serving. A few canned cherries or strawberry preserve over the filling gives a valentine appearance, and in the center of well cover, a red paper heart again carries out the idea.

Heart's Desires

Cream one scant cup of butter and slowly add two cups of sugar. When well mixed add two well-beaten eggs, one cup of rich milk and about four and a quarter cups of flour to which has been added three teaspoons of baking powder. Flavor with vanilla. Roll one quarter of an inch thick, cut in heart shapes and bake in a hot oven. Frost with boiled frosting and decorate edges with small candies while frosting is soft, alternating candies in two colors. Make candies into diamond shapes in centers.

Ginger Hearts

Boil hard for one minute one cup of molasses and one third cup of chicken fat. Partly cool, add one slightly rounded tablespoonful of ginger, one and one half teaspoons of salt, one half teaspoonful of soda and flour enough to handle. The best results are obtained by mixing and sifting the dry ingredients together and then beating hard into the molasses and shortening. Set away to get very cold. Roll thin, sprinkle with sugar and bake in a quick oven. Serve with cheese cut into heart shapes, inserting toothpick with which the cheese can be handled.

Better Cake and Biscuits

In all recipes calling for baking powder you will get better and finer food and insure its healthfulness by using baking powder made from cream of tartar, such as Royal Baking Powder.

Cream of tartar is derived from grapes—a natural food, as contrasted with phosphate or alum, derived from mineral acids, and used because of their cheapness in the manufacture of some baking powders.

Housewives are sometimes led to use inferior baking powders because of apparent lower cost, but there is little difference in cost in practical use—about one cent for a whole cake or pan of biscuits, which is very little when you consider the difference in quality and healthfulness.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

their brothers and perhaps more so for I think when a woman is interested at all, she is more deeply interested than a man.

Like you, May Day, I think we should endeavor to please after marriage the same as before but I think husband and children should share equally in our regard. We should not think more of him because he was first any more than we should care more for our first-born child simply because it was first. But where a mother has a house full of little ones and is not strong enough to keep them all and herself neat, I believe most people, husbands included, would rather see the mother neglect herself a little than neglect the children.

Miss Rose, have you thought of trying a correspondence school? There you can take any special course or a common school course.

If Mrs. Million and Miss Shafer will write me enclosing stamp, I will tell them how my mother cured herself of lung trouble.

Grace Wenberg, you must be a veritable sunbeam and I wonder why those who are able to get about do not follow your example when they are more fortunate than you.

I'm sorry I've taken up so much space but I haven't the gift of saying much in few words.

Hoping to see more of the sisters' opinions on some of the above subjects, I am,

A COMFORT sister, MRS. J. H. MORVEE.

ILLINOIS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Will you please sit over a bit to make room for a new sister? I have read COMFORT three years and like it, especially the letters and recipes, but I cannot send in any new ones for mine are all taken from COMFORT. I save every number of our dear paper.

I enjoyed Mrs. Robert Golden's letter, in the November number.

I would like to hear from some of the sisters who have adopted children as their own. My husband and I are thinking of adopting a little child. Some of my friends advise me to take one from seven to ten years old and others think a little baby the best. We would like a baby.

I am twenty-nine years old and have been married nine years, to a dear husband. We live on a farm. I raise poultry of all kinds and attend to a large garden, as well as my flowers. I have about thirty house plants. I also do a lot of crocheting, so you see I am busy all the time.

With love to the sisters and Mrs. Wilkinson.

A New Sister.

New Sister. Are you sure you really want to adopt a baby? Long before this reaches you I hope you will have arrived at a decision as to the most desirable age of adoption and that some little girl or boy is settled in your home "for keeps," for by your indecision you are wasting precious time. In years to come when you have grown to love the child as your own you will regret the years you existed without her, or him. Since you and your husband are the ones most concerned, I say go ahead and suit yourselves and if you prefer a tiny baby to an older child, by all means take the baby no matter if all your friends disapprove of your choice. You won't be sorry, and I wish you good luck and happiness. —Ed.

OAKDALE, Brookcroft Bungalow, TENN.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Here comes an interested reader from the mountains of Morgan county, East Tennessee. It is a section belonging to the Cumberland Mountains and is just on the border of the Cumberland tableland. Fruit and Irish potatoes do well here. Coal mining is also carried on extensively. Oakdale is located on the Cincinnati Southern Railway, eighty-four miles north of Chattanooga, Tenn.

Brookcroft Bungalow is about ten minutes' walk from the depot and is located in a mountain ravine. Holly and hemlock, seemingly providentially planted about "Brookcroft," cheats winter of its dreariness and throws in a semblance of green summer on a mantle of snow. Happy Hollow Creek, which almost encircles the bungalow, is lined with rhododendron, ferns, hemlock, laurel and ivy. Rhododendron Falls, on this creek, is named after the flower which grows here. In the fall of the year the happy voices of children and young people are heard as they climb the mountains gathering hickory nuts and chestnuts. Nutting expeditions are quite numerous. Squirrels of the forest vie with the youngsters in search of nuts.

"Brookcroft" is just outside the town limits of Oakdale and here, morning and evening, the cattle belonging to the townsmen pass back and forth on the pike through the ravine to the mountain forests where they roam at large. Cattle run at large in Morgan county and find pasturage in the forests. The tinkling of cowbells can be heard for miles around. The bells are strapped about the necks of the cows with leather straps. The hills and valley echo with the sound of cowbells. It is a babel of confusion to a stranger, but not so to an owner of a cow. He can tell by listening for a moment whether or not his cow is in a group some distance away. When a cow fails to come home at night the owner gets out on the mountain and listens for his cow's bell. He calls and the cow recognizing her master's voice, turns homeward. It reminds me of the Man of Galilee who said, "I am the Good Shepherd and know my sheep and am known of mine."

It is a pleasing sight of a Sunday morning when the Oakdale church bells are echoing through the ravine, to behold our mountain neighbors, with ruddy faces and cheerful dispositions, thronging tranquilly along the roadway to Sunday school and church. Many stop to get a drink of water out of the roadside spring at "Brookcroft." A rustic footbridge has been constructed across Happy Hollow Creek at this point, connecting "Brookcroft" with this spring. Christian Endeavor and Sunday school picnics are quite frequent on the "Brookcroft" premises during the summer months. Basket dinners are spread at Rhododendron Falls. Swimming, picture making and mountain climbing are some of the features of these picnics. At one of these gatherings there were young people present from six different towns.

The grandeur of the cliffs, as they lend themselves to the beauty of the ravine, makes one feel as Napoleon once said to his army in the presence of the Pyraminds, "Men, here is where centuries look down upon you."

I send you greetings from Sunny Tennessee.

Very truly yours, MRS. J. D. BURTON.

OKLAHOMA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have been reading your good advice and have decided to come to you for help.

I am a girl twenty-two years old. I work for my living but am respected and enjoy life single but I detest the name of "old maid" and my friends say I will be one, for I have never met anyone I cared for. I have had chances to marry but have refused them. Do you think I will ever be sorry? Sometimes I think I had better marry someone I merely respect, and not think about loving anyone. Would that be right? I am looking to you for advice.

Your friend, MARY.

Mary. I am inclined to think you meant your letter for Cousin Marion's department but since it was addressed plainly to me, I'm giving it space in our department to get the ideas of the good sisters as to what you had better do. Were any of you ever in similar circumstances and what did you do?—Ed.

NEW BLOOMFIELD, PA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I am coming for a chat with you on the divorce question. I am not in favor of it but still there are some people, men and women both, whom you cannot please, no matter what you may do and if you find you are tied to one of that kind or one who persists in drinking, you are better off to get a divorce for I believe that once they start drinking they will never stop. They may make promises but few stick to them.

I enjoyed May Day's letter very much and think if there were more such homes the divorce courts would have little to do. I have a good husband and try to do all I can to be a good wife. It is never too much trouble for him to help me and I try to do the same by him. He never leaves the house without saying "good by," no matter how short a time he intends to be gone, and I think that a good idea for we never know when it may be the last.

Now girls, whatever you do, don't think of getting married if you don't know how to do anything but crochet a yard of lace or embroider a rose on a pillow. Just stop and consider how far that knowledge goes toward making a home, keeping a man's love, and making one dollar do the work of two.

I advise you to read carefully Uncle Charlie's talks on the vice question. Some of you who are ignorant may think lightly of these talks but they are all true. Mothers, I think you make a great mistake to read such articles and then burn the book or papers lest your daughters see it, for most girls are ruined through ignorance. I am preserving these talks for my children to read when they are old enough.

Good by, BETSEY.

BARLING, ARK.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND ALL COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a reader of your very interesting corner for some time. I belonged to the C. L. O. C. when I was a little girl. I am married and a mother now. All letters about the training of children are of real interest to me.

I haven't the courage to write to Uncle Charlie for my spelling and grammar are too bad. I have, or had, a common school education but in the practical everydayness of our lives we let such things get away from us.

I think we should try to avoid becoming personal in our replies to letters on questions such as equal suffrage, religion or divorce. I believe in equal suffrage, yes, indeed. The men have had the vote all to themselves long enough to have accomplished more good than they have. So I say, give us "a finger in the pie" and see what we will do.

As for the divorce question, or evil, as it is called, I do not know. I have thought it not right to marry again with a living (divorced) husband or wife but it would seem hard to miss all wedded happiness on account of a mistake early in life. We can only have an opinion but would have to meet with the real experience to be able to decide positively.

Circumstances alter cases. I am sure if I did not love my husband and we did not agree that I would not punish myself or him by living together and raising a family under such unhappy circumstances. It is not fair to the children. A child's nature is much too sensitive and impressionable to live and be healthful in such an atmosphere of discord.

I believe there is room for argument in Mrs. Clyde Jones' letter about managing a husband. You can't treat them all alike. But instead of being too devoted and too good, why not make him do a little of the devotion "stunt?" If he doesn't or will not, try finding something more interesting than a mere man. Live in a comprehensive way for humanity in general, and Hubby will wake up and find you really are interesting. Nothing makes a man care quite so much for his wife as the thought that other men admire her for her real worth. I don't mean that any woman should try to attract any man's notice or win his admiration, but to be really worth while as a wife, mother, club worker or whatever niche she fills. Do it well, and do not make your husband your only aim. I have in mind a wife who thinks only of her husband's pleasure, his comfort above all else, and if she doesn't bore him now I expect she will some day. I would try a little neglect and see if he didn't think of my pleasure.

Dear Steppy, don't let it discourage you because your girls are unruly. If all the mothers would speak that have girls of their own who are not the most obedient, I am sure you would feel relieved. They are just normal girls and have been interfered with by well-meaning (?) friends.

I have a boy aged six years and a girl aged two. I want them to be obedient first of all. I have to make my boy mind but if I say "do" he must if it takes real force.

Mrs. Walter Alverson, I have met a few people who could give us real rules for bringing up our children. They usually have none of their own and don't know the first thing about them, because who but a mother can know the petty irritations and nerve-racking worries that these little ones cause us every day. You spell your last name the same as my maiden name. I have never met anyone of the same name outside of our family.

My husband works in the coal mines. He does what is called "company work" now. He used to dig coal.

THERE is a beautiful little verse written by that wonderful genius Ella Wheeler Wilcox, that I have quoted more than once in these columns. It goes like this:

"So many gods, so many creeds,
So many ways that wind and wind,
While just the art of being kind
Is all this sad world needs."

On the 3rd of February, 1897, I said good by to the busy world, the life of physical activity, and took to my bed and here I have remained for twenty years. I would not refer to this matter at all—I would rather not—except that I want to make this month the occasion for a plea on behalf of those who suffer. The art of being kind is all this sad world needs but if you want to know how rare kindness and thoughtfulness are in the world break half-a-dozen legs and three or four wings and retire to your couch utterly helpless and see how little the world will do for you if you cannot pay liberally for every service rendered.

In the main human nature is much the same the world over, and there is plenty of kindness and goodness deep down in the hearts of most people, but the trouble is they let it stay there and never give it a chance to get out. Life too is such a ferocious struggle that it develops not the best, but the worst in us. Man is a creature of habit and a victim of environment, and social conditions develop wrong habits instead of good ones, and as the lash of necessity is constantly urging us on, it is the selfish habits that grow like weeds and choke up all the beautiful flowers in the garden of the soul love, pity, mercy, kindness, truth, sincerity and brotherhood. What a wonderful world this would be if you would all get the habit of just being kind. Kindness costs nothing and yet we use it as grudgingly as though we were dispensing twenty dollar bills. If we had learned the art of being kind instead of selfish there would be no war in the world, no poverty, no booze, no white slavery, no exploitation, no ignorance. Instead we should have peace, health, happiness, prosperity, a world beautiful, a heaven on earth.

Life is a growth and all worth-while growth is a growth to goodness, a growth towards God. We grow up like flowers of the field, we bud, we bloom and then the reaper touches us, the petals of our life drop one by one, and we are gathered to his breast and taken home.

What a pity as life is so short that we should fill it with so much misery, wretchedness, meanness, hate, uncharitableness, cruelty, viciousness and unkindness. Here we are chained for a little while to the good ship earth, rushing through endless space, fretting our little hour upon life's stage, and then disappearing to be seen no more. Oh, the pity of it, that with our days but a span, and with everything necessary for our happiness, we should insist on making such poor use of our opportunities and our time. Oh, the pity of it that the art of being cruel and unjust which makes for hell should have replaced the art of being kind and just, which makes for heaven.

There are tens of thousands of churches, tens of thousands of societies, tens of thousands of books, all striving to make men learn the art of being kind, and the results of all this endeavor is pitifully small. In lands where men are savage and ignorant and have been brought but recently under the white man's civilization, cruelty and indifference to suffering, naturally or unnaturally prevail. In this favored country however, there is no reason why all might not be kind, especially to those who have fallen by the wayside of life, crushed by trouble and sickness. Those who have lived long and blameless lives, but who through economic stress, low wages or misfortune, have been unable to provide for old age, we reward with the poorhouse, usually a miserable den, more suitable for animals than humans and vastly inferior as a rule to the splendid buildings in which the horses of the rich are stabled.

If this country were at war tomorrow, it would spend twenty-five million dollars a day for killing and maiming, month after month, year after year, and think nothing of it. But when you ask it to inquire into the social and economic welfare of the masses of this country it grudgingly appropriates a few dollars for an investigation, and later when the investigators hand in their report its findings are ignored and publication is refused until forced by public clamor.

The money that is being spent by any one of the leading powers of Europe for a month's war, if devoted to welfare, would place all the crippled, the sick and the helpless in this country, and there are thousands of such, beyond the reach of want and worry for the remainder of their days. But, alas! no government will learn the art of being kind until the masses of the people learn the art of being sensible and until the art of being sensible and kind is learned, there will be no worth-while civilization, in fact no civilization at all, for civilization cannot come until the golden rule is made the rule of life.

Recently an investigation was made of institutions caring for dependent children (most of them in control of religious sects) in and around the city of New York. In a number of institutions the investigators found conditions vile, heart rending and revolting. Now it is bad enough to ill treat grown ups, but people who under the guise of charity, plentifully soused with religion, make the lives of children unbearable, well it were better that a millstone were tied about their necks, and they were cast into the sea. Here is what was reported of one "home" not far from where I reside, by a New York daily.

"Conditions most distressing. Children weak, pale and anæmic. Close cropped hair, but vermin in shocking quantities. Ringworm, head and scalp diseases and ear trouble. Eighteen to twenty-five children bathing together at one time in six inches of water. Eczema and ringworm prevalence spread by roller towels. Bed and bedsteads dirty and alive with vermin. Dining-room bleak, bare and forbidding and grim silence preserved during meals."

Here's another: "Four combs serve four hundred children. Boys use their clothing for pillows as none were provided. Food very poor, served in dirty, greasy pails. Boys lap soup from plates because there were but sixty spoons for one hundred and twenty boys.

This particular institution got over fifty thousand dollars a year from the city. One child in a dirty bed was found suffering from pneumonia, while nine other sick children, one with chicken pox, were found hidden away in the sewing-room of the institution so as to avoid the inspectors. The dormitories in this institution were so cold the investigators had to wear their overcoats.

In another institution, in the hospital of which I spent ten months, and which has a home for children attached, the inspectors described the scenes in the dining-room as most distressing. The children were found hungrily licking their plates after the meal was gone. Bread was served only twice a week.

This is what the investigators found in another institution, conducted by women who are supposed to be giving their lives to God. If they would only devote their lives to the poor little tots in their care how much more satisfied God would be. In one room that was absolutely barren save for filthy, broken-down beds, one of the windows was broken and left unrepaired for three days, although the weather was freezing. The cold was intensified by a cross draught from open doors. Here on the floor, shivering from cold and all alone, was found a three-year-old boy who was taking off his clothes to crawl into his little bed, a bed dirty almost to blackness and supplied with damp covers. In this institution there were three hundred and ten children needing medical treatment. One boy who was found wearing an old sweater, was found suffering from pneumonia. He had high fever and needed attention, but his temperature could not be taken as there was no thermometer in the building. (Thermometers by the way only cost from sixty-five cents to a dollar.) This institution had one hundred and eighty-seven acres of splendid grounds where the children might have had glorious times. Instead however, the good religious souls in charge of this vile place, had the children herded together in a fenced yard, so crowded together they could not play; and it is of these little ones that Christ said: "Suffer little children to come unto Me, and forbid them not for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven."

"The sick poor were found sleeping on the bare floor, on benches and even sitting or half reclining on two chairs, with no covering but a single thin blanket. In the morgue bodies of babies were stacked like cord wood along the wall. Adult bodies were lying on the floor in open boxes and in some cases were not even shrouded. In the tuberculosis hospital three persons were crowded into tiny rooms intended for one."

In one of the institutions, a home for aged which was examined recently, an orderly murdered eight of the most feeble and sick of the old people as they annoyed him.

There is a regular scramble by the way among the various institutions to get the city's orphans.

"Is there a profit in the children?" asked the Commissioner who conducted the investigation, of a witness. "Well they get so much a child from the city," the witness replied. "How is that profit used?" again asked the Commissioner. "It might be used to extend or maintain a religious order," said the witness smiling broadly. This witness who is a well-known expert on institutional and social conditions, said that the making of wills leaving millions to orphanages, without any study of social conditions, should be stopped, or at least controlled. "Why in Philadelphia," he added, "there are nine million dollars in two bequests to build institutions for orphan girls. There are not enough orphan girls in all Pennsylvania, by the way, to fill them."

People are continually dying and leaving vast sums for charitable purposes. They take it for granted that the money they leave will be well spent, but probably not one dollar in five is ever used for the purpose for which it was willed. If people who have money to leave to charity would only do some quiet investigating before making their wills, those who always have their claws extended for public and private doles would be more careful how they run the "homes" of which they have charge. Better still people should distribute their money during their lifetime and superintend its expenditure. If they did this they would frustrate the designs of hordes of grasping, parasitical officials, who do practically nothing for the money that is poured into institutions except half starve and neglect those committed to their care, while living on the fat of the land themselves. They also would win the plaudits of the world, and in the smiles and love of the happy little ones they had benefited they would reap a measureless reward. Money that is dragged to the grave and then willed haphazard to the leeches, cormorants, vultures and cold-hearted vampires who usually control and dominate so many institutions the world over, merely perpetuates a bad system and does but little good except to those who handle it. The money willed to institutions and various religious denominations for charitable purposes reaches enormous sums, and yet the inmates of these places are usually starved and neglected and though millions are left to various hospitals there is scarcely a free bed to be had. Right here I stopped and had Maria ring up the richest hospital in New York City, a hospital that receives millions in legacies. Just as I expected it had no free beds and the lowest charge was a dollar and a half a day. Such is charity, it suffereth long and is ever kind. Yes the same old kind—cold, hard, cruel and pitiless. Just the art of being kind you see is the art that is lacking. I have spent six years in institutions and I know what they are, even the best of them. In one institution in which I spent three and a half years, though terribly emaciated, I never saw or tasted a glass of milk, though I craved and needed milk in the worst possible way. There was the same diet for all, sick or well, and if you could not eat it you starved.

In another institution, when patients were dying their friends were never sent for. Only in one instance was a relative allowed to stay with a dying patient and for this privilege the party was soaked five dollars. When I entered that institution it was a bitter cold day and I was chilled through. I pleaded for a glass of hot milk. Finding I could not get it I begged for a glass of hot water. The nurse looked scared. There was a hot water tap in the room but nothing warm came from it. The nurse excused herself and disappeared for a while. A few minutes later I heard a high pitched voice raised in anger and the sudden crash of broken glass. In ascending from the kitchen with my glass of hot water, the nurse had been met by the superintendent—one of the typical terrors who control such places. The nurse explained what the hot water was for. The virago snatched it from her hands, and screamed: "I'll teach you to spoil my patients," and hurled glass, water and all down a flight of stairs. How does that strike you? On one occasion I spent an entire night in a small room with a corpse! Nice, kind well-meaning ladies left preserves and comforts for the sick. Their gifts were tabulated and published in a little magazine, which told of the good work this institution was doing. None of these gifts ever reached the patients. They were immediately confiscated and devoured by the individual in charge of the place. On Sunday a religious service was held in the parlor of this institution, but those who prattled of the Christ never once went up-stairs to see the sick, and the good, well-meaning ladies who were "interested" in this institution, never once investigated it or visited the inmates, but salved their conscience by donating the usual pot of jam. If, as we believe, there is a day when all will have to give an accounting for their deeds done here on earth before the bar of divine justice you will find millions of good, self-satisfied, complacent, matter-of-fact Christians, mechanically reaching out for the inevitable pot of jam or jar of preserves. If Billy Sunday were more concerned with the things of this world and less with hell and heaven I would give him a hint to yell daily at the crowds who come to hear him, good people who though having a chance to do practical, Christ-like work, usually close their eyes to the wonderful opportunities presented them for loving service and devotion and care only about saving their pleayune souls: "You can't square yourselves with God with a pot of jam. The only way to square yourselves with God is to practise the art of being kind." You who are up and around, healthy and well, think you know something of the world, but you don't. To know the world actually as it is and the people in it, you must become sick, helpless and penniless—then you will know the world and the horror of it. Then you will know that those who need and should have the tenderest care and kindest treatment, are usually treated like wild animals.

My object in writing this article is to awaken the interest of those who have prospered in those who have not and also to remind those who think that church and prayers constitute all that is necessary and essential for Christian living, and also all that is necessary to gain eternal life, that neither church nor prayers, though good in their way, will get one anywhere unless one lives a life of deeds, a life of sacrifice, service and devotion, a life of thoughtfulness, generosity and kindness. The world has had church and prayers for two thousand years and you've only got to look over in Europe, down in Mexico or round the hospitals and institutions of this and other cities to see how little churches and prayers have lifted the human animal above his savage self, how little he is being lifted from beasthood to manhood and godhood. If you would know what real Christianity, as distinct from sham Christianity is, what real kindness is, listen to this: There is a helpless woman in the South who has been an invalid for many years, and who has all she can do to barely exist. This afflicted woman has unaided, raised sufficient, by interesting those who have money and by securing COMFORT subscriptions, to buy a number of wheel chairs for helpless people whose sad and pitiful condition has been drawn to her attention. This poor creature lately become so helpless that she found it necessary to get an invalid lifter, an expensive contrivance which lifts a helpless person and places him or her in a wheel chair or any other position desired. She could not get the money to secure this invalid lifter, but her indomitable spirit was not to be conquered. She got two or three hundred subscriptions for the COMFORT magazine which entitled her to this all necessary contraption which she so sadly needed. The majority of people would not have done a single thing they would have made their wants known and waited for "George" to do it. But let me finish my story. Just as this noble soul was about to get her invalid lifter, she heard of someone who was sadly in need of a wheel chair. That settled it. The lifter was forgotten and she let all the subscriptions she had collected go to get a wheel chair for someone else, remaining patiently the while on her bed of suffering, happy in the thought that she had made someone else happy. Don't pity her. She is happier than any of you will ever be. She can walk with God and soar with the angels. She has reached heights sublime to which few of you will ever climb. How selfish, crude, savage and mean seem the lives of the average person in comparison with this sanctified spirit. I could tell you of other and similar deeds, for I am in touch with the great brotherhood and sisterhood of suffering, but this will suffice. It is the poor who minister to the poor, the purse proud pass by. All our mercy work for shut-ins and wheel-chair distribution is made possible by the devoted efforts of less than four hundred Christ-like people. Another case of let George do it. I trust this little incident will touch your heart and touch your pocketbooks and enlist the services of those who love in the cause of those who suffer. The average well person has no idea of the cruel wrongs that are practised by the strong and unscrupulous on the poor, the weak and the helpless.

During my twenty years of invalidism I've been the victim of the most hideous wrongs, the most pitiless cruelty. Helplessness instead of affording protection has only stimulated the ferocity of those whose duty it was to show me kindness and consideration. Christ enjoined us to visit the sick. Here's a little idea of how His

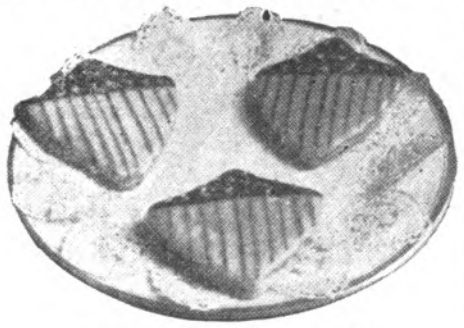
WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY LUNCHEON PARTY



By Ella Gordon

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

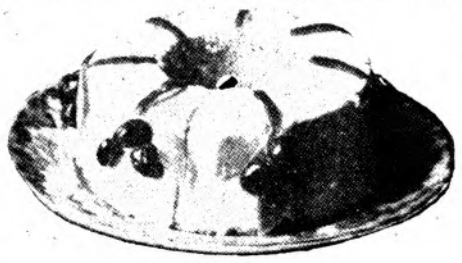
GEORGE WASHINGTON, the father of our country, was born in the year 1732, on the twenty-second day of February, and so long as our country lives, shall we do homage to his memory and derive inspiration from his exalted character by a fitting celebration of the anniversary of his birthday.

No form of decoration could be used with more appropriateness for a social celebration of Washington's birthday than the national flag with drum and eagle.

For a centerpiece take a blonde doll, dressing it in red, white and blue paper. Make a hat of two American flags. Set doll in center of round piece of wood, and around the edge bore tiny holes in which flags may be held upright. Around the centerpiece at regular intervals, place toy drums on which are perched small American eagles. Make three-cornered bonbon boxes of red stiff paper, the shape being suggestive of the three-cornered cocked hat characteristic of the Continental army. For covers, use a doll holding a small flag and wearing a silver cap.

WASHINGTON BIRTHDAY SHIELDS.

The place cards are made of paper, shaped like ice-cream cones and covered with silver paper. Put a tiny flag in the top of each.



The following recipes are offered as suggestions for a Washington birthday luncheon.

Washington Birthday Shields

Cream with a spoon half a cupful of butter with one tablespoonful of lard and add, very gradually, one cupful of sugar, one teaspoonful of cinnamon, a pinch of ginger and a saltspoonful of salt and two squares of melted chocolate. Add two well-beaten eggs and three tablespoonfuls of milk in which half a teaspoonful of soda has been dissolved. Stir in just enough sifted flour to handle. Roll quarter of an inch thick, cut in the shape of shields and bake in a quick oven. Frost with boiled frosting and cover the upper third with a thin layer of chocolate frosting. Make ten verticle stripes of the chocolate frosting and thirteen stars of the white frosting on the chocolate covered upper part.

Washington Cherry Cake

Cream one third cup of butter, add one and one half cups of sugar, a little at a time, and cream all together. Measure two and one quarter cups of sifted flour, and sift again with one quarter of a teaspoonful of soda and a scant three quarters of a teaspoonful of cream of tartar. Have measured half a cup of milk. Add milk and flour alternately and beat smooth, and lastly add the whites of five eggs that have been beaten stiff. Pour into a round tin that has a hole or funnel in the center. Bake in moderate oven till the cake shrinks from pan—about forty-five minutes. Cover the bottom of a large plate or agate pan with rose geranium leaves, and place the hot cake on them, and it will give a delicious rose flavoring. When cold, cover with white frosting. Cut even narrow strips of citron and press into frosting before it is quite set, marking the cake into even sections. Decorate with clusters of fresh cherries, or if they cannot be obtained, use candied cherries, pressing them slightly into frosting before it is set.

Washington Birthday Hats

Make rich paste by sifting two cups of flour with one scant teaspoon of salt, having mixing bowl and flour very cold. Chop into flour with a knife four tablespoons of lard and five of butter, first chilling both. The flour and shortening should be the consistency of dry meal. Wet with enough ice water to make a stiff dough, adding a little at a time and mixing with a knife. Don't melt the butter by mixing with the hands. Roll into three-cornered shape, bring corners toward center, fold once and roll thin. Cut into three-cornered pieces, then cut the corner off about one inch. Moisten corners, fold edges over and press corners together so the corners will be sharp and the folded edges form an upturned hat brim.

HAT CROWNS.—Mash two cups of cranberries, add one quarter of a cup of water and boil fifteen minutes. Stir frequently. Press through a fine sieve, add two cups of sugar and cook four minutes. Pour just enough into cups to make desired height to hat crowns. Put jelly into pastry just before serving.

isn't it time we were in our places for the reception?"

"Yes, yes; run along, all of you. Lead the way, Nellie, please—you know how to go up through the billiard-room," said Mrs. Goddard, nervously, as she gently pushed the girl toward the stairway. Then bending toward Edith she whispered, imploringly:

"I beg, I entreat you, Edith, not to spoil everything—everybody will wonder why you are not with the others, and I cannot explain why you refused to stand with my brother. Go! go! you must not keep my guests waiting. Emil, take her," and with an imperative gesture to her brother, she swept on toward the stairway after the others to arrange them effectively in the drawing-room.

Emil Correlli shot a searching look into the face of the girl beside him.

It was cold and proud the beautiful eyes still glowing with indignation.

"Pardon me just this once," he said, humbly, "and let me add my entreaties to my sister's," and he tried gently to force her toward the stairway.

"Go on," she said, haughtily, "and I will follow. Since I have been tricked into this affair so far, a little more of the same folly cannot matter, and rather than subject Mrs. Goddard to a public mortification, I will yield the point."

She made a gesture for him to proceed, and he turned to obey, a gleam of triumph leaping into his eyes at her concession.

Without a word they swiftly made their way back into the house and down to the elegant parlors where, at the upper end the first object to greet their eyes was a beautiful floral arch with an exquisite marriage bell suspended from it.

On either side of this the bridesmaids and ushers had taken their places, and into the center of it Emil Correlli now led his companion.

And now ensued the last and most fiendish act in the dastardly plot.

Hardly were they in their places when the guests came pouring into the room, and the ushers began their duties of presentation, while Edith, with a sinking heart, but growing every moment more indignant and disgusted with what appeared to her only a horrible and senseless mockery was obliged to respond to hundreds of congratulations and bear in silence being addressed as Mrs. Correlli.

Once, when there was a little pause, she turned haughtily upon the man at her side.

"Why am I addressed thus?" she demanded. "Why do you allow it? Why do you not correct these people and tell them to use the name that was used in the play rather than yours?"

"Perhaps they forget—I—I suppose it seems more natural to address me by my name," he faltered.

"I do not like it—I will not submit to it a moment longer," Edith indignantly returned.

"Hush! it is almost over," said her companion, in a swift whisper, as others came forward just then, and she was obliged, though rebellious and heart-sick, to submit to the ordeal.

But it was over at last, for, as the introductions were made, the guests passed back to the carriage-house, which had been cleared for dancing, and where the musicians were discoursing alluring strains in rhythmic measure.

Even the bridesmaids and ushers, tempted by the sounds, at last deserted their posts, and Emil Correlli and his victim were finally left alone, the sole occupants of the drawing-room.

"Will you come and dance?" he inquired, as he turned a pleading look upon her. Just once, to show that you forgive me for what I have done tonight."

"No, I cannot," said Edith, coldly and wearily. "I am going directly up-stairs to divest myself of this mocking finery as soon as possible."

A swift, hot flush suffused Emil Correlli's face, at these words.

"Pray do not speak so bitterly and slightly of what has made you, in my eyes at least, the most beautiful woman in this house tonight," he said.

"Flattery from you, sir, after what has occurred, is, to speak mildly, exceedingly unbecoming," Edith haughtily responded, and turned proudly away from him as if about to leave the room.

But, at that moment, Mr. Goddard, who had not presented himself before, came hurriedly forward and confronted them. His face was very pale, but there was an angry light in his eyes and a bitter sneer upon his lips.

"Well, Correlli, I am bound to confess that you have stolen a march upon us tonight, in fine style," he remarked, in a mocking tone, "and madam—Mrs. Correlli, I should say—allow me to observe that you have outshone yourself this evening, both as an actress and a beauty! Really, the surprise the denouement, to which you have treated us surpasses anything in my experience; it was certainly worthy of a Dumas! Permit me to offer you my heartiest congratulations."

"Let this wretched farce end here and now," said Edith, straightening herself and lifting her flashing eyes to his face. "I am heartily sick of it, and I trust you will never again presume to address me by the name that you have just used."

"Indeed! and are you so soon weary of your new title? Not yet an hour a bride, and sick of your bargain!" retorted Gerald Goddard, with a mocking laugh.

"I am no 'bride,' as you very well know, sir," spiritedly returned Edith.

"No bride?" he repeated, skeptically.

"No, sir. I told you it was simply a farce. I was merely appealed to to take the place, in the play, of Miss Kerby, who was called home by telegram," Edith explained.

Mr. Goddard glanced from her to his brother-in-law in unfeigned perplexity.

"What are you saying?" he demanded. "Do you mean to tell me that you believe that last act was a farce?—that you do not know that you have been really and lawfully married to the man beside you?"

"Certainly I have not! What do you mean, sir, by such an unwarrantable assertion?" spiritedly retorted the young girl, but losing every atom of color, as a suspicion of the terrible truth flashed through her mind.

Gerald Goddard turned fiercely upon his brother-in-law at this, for he also now began to suspect treachery.

"What does she mean?" he cried, sternly. "Has she been led into this thing blindfolded?"

"I think it would be injudicious to make a scene here," Emil Correlli replied, in a low tone, but with white lips, as he realized that the moment which he had so dreaded had come at last.

"What do you mean? Why do you act and speak as if you believed that mockery to be a reality?" exclaimed Edith, looking from one face to the other.

"Edith," began Mr. Goddard, in an impressive tone, "do you not know that you are this man's wife?—that the ceremony on yonder stage was, in every essential a legal one, and performed by an ordained minister of Boston?"

"No! never! I do not believe it. They never would have dared do such a dastardly deed!"

Then drawing her perfect form erect, she turned with a withering glance to the craven at her side.

"Speak!" she commanded. "Have you dared to play this miserable trick upon me?"

Emil Correlli quailed beneath the righteous indignation expressed in her flashing glance; his eyes dropped and conscious guilt was shown in his very attitude.

"Forgive me—I loved you so," he stammered, and—she was answered.

She threw out her hands in a gesture of repudiation and horror; she flashed one withering, horrified look into his face, then, with a moan of anguish, she swayed like a reed broken by the tempest, and would have fallen to the floor in her spotless robes had not Gerald Goddard caught her senseless form in his arms, and, lifting her by main strength, he bore her from the room and up-stairs to her own chamber.

CHAPTER XIV.

"YOUR FAITHLESSNESS TURNED ME INTO A DEMON."

Emil Correlli followed Mr. Goddard and his unconscious burden, looking like anything but a happy bridegroom.

When Mr. Goddard reached the girl's room he laid her upon her bed, and then sent one of the servants for the housekeeper. But Mrs. Weld could not be found, so another maid was called, and Edith was gradually restored to consciousness.

But the moment her glance fell upon Emil Correlli, who insisted upon remaining in the room, and she realized what had occurred, she relapsed into another swoon, so deathlike and prolonged that a physician, who happened to be among the guests, was summoned from the ballroom to attend her.

He excluded everyone but the maids from the room, when he ordered his patient to be undressed and put into bed, and after long and unwearied efforts, she was again revived, when she became so unnerved and hysterical that the physician, becoming alarmed, was about to give her a powerful opiate, when she sank into a third fainting fit.

Meanwhile, in the ballroom below, gayety was at its height. There had been a little stir and commotion when it was learned that Edith had fainted; but the matter was passed over with a few well-bred comments of regret, and then forgotten for the time. But as soon as she could do so without being observed, madam stole from the place and went into the house to ascertain how the girl was.

She was, of course, aware of the cause of the swoon, and, as may be readily imagined, was in no comfortable frame of mind. She was met at the head of the second flight of stairs by her husband, whose face was grave and stern.

"How is she?" madam inquired.

"In a very critical condition; Dr. Arthur says she is liable to have brain fever," he tersely replied.

"Brain fever!" exclaimed his wife, in a startled tone. "Surely, she cannot be as bad as that!"

"Woman, what have you done?" the man demanded. "How have you dared to plot and carry out the dastardly deed that you have perpetrated this night?"

"That is neither the tone nor the manner you should employ in addressing me, Gerald, as you very well know," she retorted, with colorless lips.

"Have done with your tragic airs, madam," he cried. "I have had enough of them. I ask you again, how have you dared to commit this crime?"

"Crime?" she repeated, with a start, but flashing him a glance that made him wince. "You use a harsh term, Gerald; but if you desire a reason for what has occurred tonight, I can give you two."

"Name them," her companion curtly demanded.

"First and foremost, then—to protect myself."

"To protect yourself—from what?"

"From treachery and desertion."

"Anna!"

"You know how to do it very well, Gerald,"

Forecasts for Mid-Winter Fashions

By Geneva Gladding

CLOTHES that are pretty, comfortable and attractive will delight young folks as well as "grown ups."

Over-blouse styles in quaint lines are so becoming to girls in their teens. They are nice for combinations of material; for serge, garbardine, and for wash fabrics, to wear with underwaists or guimpes of lawn or batiste.

Pockets and pocket trimmings still hold their own.

There are new Russian blouses, with long shouldered yokes and straight gathered peplums. They are nice in crepe de chine, satin and taffeta, worn with a three- ar four-piece skirt.

Empire styles are shown in afternoon as well as in evening frocks.

Jack London's Genius

By C. L. Cheever

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

JACK LONDON, novelist, Socialist, reformer and anthropologist, has expired.

His tempestuous career was begun in San Francisco in January, 1876. He was the son of John and Flora London, both very poor and the boy was allowed to run the streets in his childhood, spending his pennies for beer instead of candy, because he thought it more manly. In later life he became a strong prohibitionist.

At eight years of age he was a ranch boy, working long hours, delving into such books as Washington Irving's "Alhambra," though he never could recall just how he knew how to read or write, having no recollection of having been taught either. In no way could he persuade the cowboys to be interested in what was such entertainment to him. He gloated over dime novels, stale newspapers and other usual ranch literature. At eleven he went to Oakland; there he spent hours in the public library.

From now on a great spirit of adventure swept over him and he decided to become an oyster pirate, shipping as a sailor on a schooner, later he became a salmon fisher. Turning from fisherman to fish patrolman he had many wild adventures in those lawless waters. Then he shipped before the mast on a seal hunting expedition to the Japanese coast and Behring Sea. Then he returned to California to find work as a day laborer coal shoveling, longshoring and making jute.

While London was doing thirteen hours a day in the jute mill he won the first prize in a competition of a San Francisco newspaper with a description of a typhoon off the coast of Japan. This he wrote after midnight.

Then he became a tramp, wandering all over the United States and Canada serving a term in jail for vagrancy. At nineteen he went back to Oakland, attending high school for a year and doing work as a janitor to support himself.

He spent three months cramming after his year in the high school, and entered the University of California, for which a four-years' preparatory course is usually required. To support himself he worked in a laundry, and after a brave struggle to make ends meet, was obliged to give up study at the University in his freshman year. Then London began writing, decided he was a failure, and went to the Klondike. While he was there his father died and, London, upon his return took up the burden of supporting the family. He wrote copiously but met with rejection after rejection. Finally a story was accepted and he received five dollars for it. Soon after that he received forty dollars for a story. It was like a fortune to him.

From that time on success was his and with it world-wide recognition. With his increased popularity came wealth and his beautiful home at Glen Ellen among the California mountains is one of the most elaborately equipped ranches in that wonderful country.

London traveled much, his "Cruise of the Snark" being the result of an adventurous journey. He went as a war correspondent in the Russo-Japanese war and when trouble with Mexico became acute he went to Vera Cruz to gain material for writing. He recently returned from several months spent in the Hawaiian Islands in search of health; his health having been undermined by his trip through the South Pacific in the Snark.

Jack London would have been forty-one years old on the twelfth of January.

One of the best known authors in the world, his books have been translated into numerous languages. In Sweden he is the most popular foreign writer.

Among his books are:

"The Son of the Wolf," 1900; "The God of His Fathers," 1901; "The Children of the Forest," 1902; "A Daughter of the Snows," 1902; "The Call of the Wild," 1903; "The Sea Wolf," 1904; "The Faith of Men," 1904; "Before Adam," 1908; "When God Laughs," 1910; "The Cruise of the Snark," 1911; "John Barleycorn," 1913; "The Valley of the Moon," 1913 and many others.

instructions are carried out. I was induced to become a member of a church in the city in which I reside, by the pastor, a splendid fellow whose name is known from coast to coast and whom many of you have heard on the lecture platform. His church has a membership of six thousand most of them wealthly people. My anthems and musical numbers have been sung in this church. The pastor often refers to me in his sermons, and as I am written up once or twice every year by one or more of the big New York newspapers, there is not a member of that congregation that does not know about me, and yet in eight years that my name has been on the books of that church not a single member of that congregation has ever knocked at my door, or dropped me a card, though the pastor and his assistant often visit me. So much for their brand of Christianity.

It is amusing and pitiful too to see scores of ministers pleading with Billy Sunday to come to this, that or the other city to save the sinners with slang and vaudeville stunts and scare the backsliders into their church pews by reviving the old-time fear of hell fire. When the churches are ready to preach the humanities, the art of being kind and give their congregations practical Christian tasks to do, making them realize that their obligations to their weaker brothers cannot be liquidated by the handing out of a pot of jam, or the grudging giving of dollars many of which have been skinned from the poor during the week, the churches will be full and we won't need sensation or the language of the gutter to fill them. Just preach the art of being kind and live the golden rule which is kindness in action and above all else visit the sick and the afflicted, for it is by the way we measure the value of human life, and the tenderness, love and mercy we show to our weaker brothers and sisters and especially to the sick and afflicted, that God and the world can measure us and gauge the standard of our civilization and our right to exist as a nation. All that the world needs is kindness and it is so easy to be kind. If you are kind you will be generous in thought and in deed and you will be living a real life of service, walking with God. This is my message to you on the twentieth anniversary of my invalidism. Bear what I have said in mind. Memorize and daily repeat the little verse with which this article begins and memorize too that more beautiful verse which was spoken by the Christ: "This commandment I give unto you that ye love one another." Kindness and love! That is all the world needs to heal its wounds, for of them justice is born. Kindness and love would bring heaven on earth. Do your part in this glorious work and do it at once that we may have heaven here and now as well as beyond.

Don't forget that Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books may still be had. Start in at once to obtain them,—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort,—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk stiff covers, either one for a club of four subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues and the best gifts in the world.

My picture book, too, has started a deluge of inquiries: Is Billy the Goat my daughter, is Maria her Ma? Is there an Aunt Charlie? Is the big boy in the picture book my only baby? I have had a little leaflet specially printed answering all these questions fully, and those who are interested will find the same in every copy of the four Uncle Charlie Books sent out this season.

Now for the letters.

PRYORSBURG, KY.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am twelve years old, have black hair, brown eyes, am dark complected and am not at all good looking. This isn't a very pretty town. I should hardly call it a town at all it is so small. I go to school and am in the seventh grade. I like to read good books and I don't want to work much when I have one. I have a twin sister and we both can play a little bit on our organ. We milk and have the best gentle cow. I milk on one side and Lorene, my sister, milks on the other side. The cow's name is Lily. I think COMFORT is a very good paper and I read it every month, and it is a cheap paper too.

Well, I must pick peas and I hope Billy the Goat won't eat this. Your loving niece, ALYNE GIBSON.

Alyne, will you kindly give our best love to Lily. In these quarrelsome days when human "beans" are making beasts of themselves by killing one another in the old world, and by starving one another in the United States, it is such an intense relief to turn from savage humanity to dear, sweet, ladylike, refined, gentle, docile Lily, chewing the cud of content and giving sustenance and strength, life and vigor to a bunch of snarling humans, utterly unworthy her devotion and keen sense of duty. We take everything for granted in this world, scarcely ever counting our blessings, and we have so many of them, Lily probably being chief among them all. Just think what we owe to that kindly Providence that gave us Lily and all Lily's sisters and ancestors for millions of years back. There never was a time when Lily and her kin were not working overtime for our benefit, and there never was a time when we superior "beans," the lords of creation, weren't filling Lily's milk with water, and figuring how much she'd fetch a pound, when we decided her life of usefulness, gentleness and sweetness should be ended by a smash gently applied to Lily's cocoanut with an axe or a safety razor. If I were asked to rear a monument today to the greatest benefactor of the human race I would have a sculptor make a nice bronze model of Lily, and I'd put her on a pedestal a thousand miles high, where the butcher couldn't reach her, and the flies couldn't worry her. On a statue beside Lily, I would put a hen—good old Biddy. I owe my life to Lily and Biddy. Without them I would not be alive today, without them I could not continue to live. They give us eggs, milk, butter and cheese. They give us life, health and strength, and both Lily and the hen are always perfect ladies and are always on the job. How infinitely more useful are Lily and Biddy than Mr. Bull and Mr. Rooster. The rooster does the crowing while the hen makes the showing. He dresses up in gaudy clothes while she wears the plainest attire possible. Mr. Bull too, parades around like a political boss at election time. I'll wager if there was any voting being done in the animal world, Mr. Bull and Mr. Rooster would be sitting on the ballot box all day without allowing the ladies to even have a look in. How much more useful are the lives of Lily and Biddy than a lot of two-legged humans that I know who spend their lives in idleness and pleasure. Dear old Lily, bless her heart. She does not wear a cholera belt for a dress, a flower pot for a hat, nor squeeze her internal organs all out of shape with a steel bird cage. Neither does Lily paint her face, powder her nose, put soot on her eyelids, and daub her lips like a brazen drab. Above all else Lily and Biddy are producers, and that in the last analysis, is the one essential, fundamental standard by which all humans and animals must be judged. The producer is an asset, the none producer a liability. The non producer also is a menace, a parasite. Soon there will be no room for them on the face of the earth. At present the non producers are in the saddle and have the best of it, but their day is doomed and they will soon be in the discard. So once more I take off my hat to Lily and Biddy and to you dear Alyne, who have introduced us to Lily the best, gentle, ladylike cow in the world.

USEFUL VALENTINES THAT CHILDREN CAN MAKE

By Jane Arnold

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

CHILDREN love to make their own valentines and if instead of the usual hearts and darts and amorous nonsense, they can make something really useful as well as ornamental, it will interest them far more and give much greater pleasure to the recipient.

Let the child learn, first of all, to cut out a heart, for the heart in all colors and sizes is the foundation of the valentine. Take a piece of thin paper—newspaper will do—and fold it together. Then cut a lobe, so that the fold will come in the center. When opened out the two lobes will at least be the same shape, and a little practise in trimming will make them satisfactory.

A valentine photograph frame will be most acceptable. The foundation is a heart-shaped piece of heavy white mat board measuring at least six inches across. Next cut a slightly smaller heart from water color paper with a heart-shaped opening in the center. This paper is to be purchased at a stationer's store for a few cents a sheet. Gild or paint this smaller heart crimson and fasten it over the blotter hearts by tying ribbons matching it in color through holes made with a punch or the ends of scissors. Slip an attractive kodak picture between the two hearts so that it will show through the opening and fasten it by drops of photographic paste at the corners.

A dainty valentine needlebook will delight the girl friend who is clever with her fingers in the art of sewing.

The foundation is a large heart cut out of pasteboard, and covered with silk. This has a lighter lining, also cut from pasteboard and covered with silk. The two are overhanded together and the edges are covered with cord. Two or three smaller hearts cut from flannel hold the needles and may be fastened to the inside by a ribbon drawn through the heart and tied in a bow on the outside. Use bright scarlet or yellow gold silk for this with ribbons to match and it will add to the color scheme if the flannel patches that hold the needles are finished at the edges with a buttonhole stitch or with feather stitching of a matching color in heavy silk.

When the heart needlebook is finished, it may be bent together in book shape and slipped into an envelope for mailing.

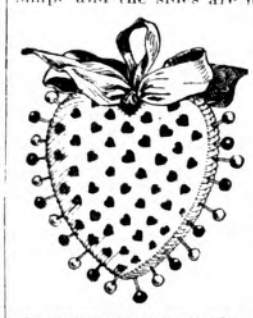
Another dainty and useful valentine is a pin case in heart shape. Two hearts cut out of light cardboard; are covered with silk. The silk should be securely pasted down with library paste on the wrong side of the cardboard, and the two hearts are overhanded together and finished with a ribbon bow and loop at the top. Use red silk for this or white silk with tiny red dots or some other small figures. A very attractive color scheme is to use white or golden yellow silk or satin and on it paint very small red hearts in water colors. It is possible to find pins with yellow or red glass heads and these may be alternated with white-headed pins stuck about the edge of the pin case.

A heart sachet will carry the perfume of friendship to a friend and keep it throughout an entire year.

To make it, cut out two thin pasteboard hearts and cover them on one side with sheet wadding. The wadding may be pasted down on the other side after the space between it and the cardboard has been liberally dusted with sachet powder.

The hearts should then be covered with colored silk above the wadding, and this, too, should be pasted down with library paste. The two wrong sides should be placed together and the hearts overhanded round the edges.

Choose the daintiest possible flowered silk for this, a white or cream ground with little bunches of flowers in gay colors. The frill of lace that finishes the edge gives it the appearance of a real valentine. Make a dozen of these dainty little heart sachets. They will be most acceptable and are easily mailed.



VALENTINE BLOTTER.

Equally as attractive and easier to make is an envelope valentine sachet.

A kodak picture may be effectively used in making this sachet. A heart that will just cover the picture should be outlined at the side of an envelope and cut out. The edge of this opening may be outlined in gold paint or India ink. The picture should be pasted on the inside of the envelope so that it will show through, and below it the words, "To My Valentine," are lettered in the gold paint, or simply written in ink in the hand-writing of the picture's original. The sachet-powder should be wrapped in tissue paper, and slipped into the envelope, and the flap securely pasted down to preserve the scent as long as possible. It is possible to use other small photographs or to paint a little design in water colors in place of using the kodak picture.

Home-made bonbons or cream peppermint drops moulded in heart shape may be sent in a valentine bonbon box. Stiff paper is used for the foundation of the box, modelled in square shape and the sides are bent up and tied in place with bows of very narrow red ribbon. A large red heart is pasted to the top. This can be made of red cardboard or, still more attractive, may be of red satin glued over a cardboard foundation. Fill the box with candies, and tie a ribbon around the sides. A little cupid painted in water colors or clipped from a magazine adds an attractive finish.

VALENTINE PINCUSHION.

A valentine blotter will prove quite as useful as any of these other valentine gifts.

The single sheet of white water-color paper which yielded one heart for the photograph frame will provide another to hold the heart-shaped pieces of blotting paper.

The hearts are cut out, and fastened together at the top with ribbon. Use red blotting paper. The cover should be outlined in gold and some verse or a single line, such as "For My Lady Fair" is lettered in gold on the cover.

HAWTHORNE, N. J.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE AND COMFORT COUSINS:

This is the second time I venture to write. I am a girl of seventeen years. I have been lame since four years of age. I had hip disease on both sides which left me very stiff. I first used crutches, but now walk with the aid of a cane. After my legs were cured I had a dose of rheumatism, which bothers me every spring.

What would you advise for a lame girl to do to make a living. I did not go to school very much. I do not have to work now, but if my parents die I will have to support myself, but how?

Well, Uncle, I have never been in New York City, but if I do get there I am sure coming to see you. Not until you sent me my membership card did I know you lived so near us.

Uncle, what do you think of this infantile paralysis plague? I think it is the hand of God. The Bible tells us that there shall come wars and plagues. We have the great war in Europe, the fish problem (I mean about the sharks which were by the coast for a while) and now this plague.

Hearty congratulations for your birthday and I hope that God may spare you many more years. I would like to hear from any of the cousins. Hoping the Goat don't eat this, I remain your niece,

ANNA VANDERVALK, (League No. 41,312).

Anna, your physical disabilities have handicapped you in the struggle for existence. Don't however be discouraged. You have your hands, your brain and good eyesight. If you were blind you would be right in thinking you were up against a tough proposition, though there are lots of blind people making a fairly good living today. Your spelling is poor but that is a fault that can be overcome. I think you are bright enough to learn stenography. You ought to be able to keep accounts if you took a course in bookkeeping. You could also hold down a cashier's job in a restaurant or store. You could do manicure work. These are all sedentary positions. From the waist up you are as well off as anyone, and the world is full of waist up jobs. Your condition should excite the sympathy and arouse the interest of the good and influential people of your village. There are a few good people in the world and I know they will use their influence to get you a position, if you will only fit yourself first to do some one thing well. It is wonderful what cripples have done and are doing in this world. The thing that counts even more than ability is will power. If you sit down and pity yourself and keep thinking how badly the world is using you you will get nowhere and accomplish little if anything. Stay in your home town and when people learn you are making a brave effort to overcome the handicap of disease, they will talk about you. It won't be long before you will have one or two staunch and helpful friends. There are people in this world who admire those who surmount all kinds of difficulties and face cruel fate with high courage and a brave heart. Let nothing discourage you and you will win out. I don't think God had anything to do with the infantile paralysis plague. If I thought He was responsible for it, life would change altogether for me as I would have no God. My God is a God of love. Not a mushy God but one who can correct and punish when necessary. It is inconceivable and preposterous to think that a Divine Power would suddenly throw off the divine, the merciful, the loving, and forgiving, and become a brutal murderer of innocent children and little babies, torturing them horribly in their last hours, or maiming them for life. A brute and a monster might do that, but to connect God with such a hideous crime to my mind is unspeakably awful. We shall find out after a while what causes infantile paralysis. It is strange, but almost the last thing I read in one of the many daily papers I take, was an account of the discovery of the polyiomyletis germ, by one of the medical staff of the Johns Hopkins Hospital of Baltimore. In spite of the large number of deaths from plague in New York City, the death rate even among children this summer was much lower than it was ten years ago. Not a single case of paralysis occurred amongst the thousands of children whose mothers daily receive free gifts of pasteurized milk from Nathan Straus the philanthropist. That would tend to prove that some germ in the milk is responsible for the trouble. Time and science will solve this problem. God has given us the necessary equipment to solve all our problems. If we don't use the equipment that is not God's fault. God does not go around putting deadly germs in milk. Dirt, filth and ignorance cause disease, and poverty and injustice cause dirt, filth and ignorance. Man's injustice to man is at the root of nearly all the world's ills, and not until that injustice causes disease that slays rich and poor alike, does thoughtless, stupid humanity wake up, take action and clean house. As long as we have injustice we shall have poverty, and as long as we have poverty we shall have ignorance, and as long as we have ignorance we shall have filth and dirt, and filth and dirt fill the world with disease, and all sorts of deadly germs which have no respect for age, sex or station. Love, justice, and science, will conquer disease and all the rest of our ills. We do our own killing, murdering and slaying and God has no hand in it—at least my God hasn't.

ARCOLA, IND.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a girl thirteen years old, have brown hair, blue eyes, height five feet two inches, weight ninety pounds. I will graduate from the eighth grade this year. Do you advise me to go to high school? I like to go to school but it isn't very convenient because the nearest high school is ten miles away at Fort Wayne. I live near the little town of Arcola on a farm of two hundred and forty acres.

Twelve girls including myself have organized a Camp Fire Girls' Club and have planned to do lots of good work this summer. We intend to give entertainments and such to pay our expenses. Do you think it a good organization Uncle Charlie?

My sister takes COMFORT and I enjoy reading it very much. I hope to see this letter in print so don't let Billy the Goat get it.

Your loving niece, MARY FELGER.

Mary, you ask me if I think the Camp Fire Girls' Club a good organization. Yes dear, I think it is an excellent organization. Anything that brings you girls together and gets you all working harmoniously along lines that promote health and helpfulness, is good for you and good for the community, good for the state, good for the nation and good for the race. Out of little acorns big oaks grow, but nothing grows worth while while people remain apart. Individual thinking, excellent though it is, seldom gets us anywhere. It is collective thought and the collective action that collective thought inspires that moves the world. I have not looked very deeply into the Camp Fire Girls' organization, but if the idea behind it was only to get you girls out under canvas every year for a week or two, get you an entirely new environment where you can rub noses with old Dame Nature and get those abominations called corsets off your bodies, so that your internal machinery can get a chance to work normally, the camp-fire idea would be promoting a glorious work. Two weeks of wholesome, care-free recreation under the blue skies of

The Heart Auction

By Leslie Gordon

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

THIS is a new sort of entertainment sure to make a great deal of fun for a party of young people. It is also easy to give and does not require the hostess to go to much expense. The novelty begins with the form of the invitations which are like the bill heads used to advertise a country auction. They are more effective typewritten or printed, but they can also be written on note paper with good effect. They should read something like this:

AUCTION AUCTION AUCTION

On the evening of February 14th beginning at eight o'clock sharp there will be a gigantic auction of Hearts at the home of Miss Cornelia Lewis on Maple Ave.

Fresh Hearts, Sweet Hearts, Damaged Hearts, Hard Hearts, Soft Hearts, Broken Hearts, Patched Hearts, and Unfeeling Hearts—

Positively the Finest Collection in this country

Will all be sold unreservely to the highest bidder (no restrictions or reserved prices)

The Best Bid Takes the Heart.

Valentine Party. Answer if you please.

It is best to put "Valentine Party" on the last line of the invitation otherwise your would-be guests might not understand just what the invitation signified and might be puzzled about what it was they were asked to attend. But if these words are added to the invitation they know at once that it is some new sort of a Valentine frolic that they are to honor with their company and are not being requested to spend their money at any kind of a sale.

The most important person at a Valentine Auction is naturally the auctioneer. If the hostess is blessed with a good measure of what is sometimes called the "gift of gab" there is no reason why she should not take this part herself, but if she is not such a ready talker or feels shy about making herself so prominent, some other person, either a man or a woman, must be asked. It is well to make arrangements in advance so that when the person chosen for this office arrives at the party he or she will know exactly what to do and then when the guests have all arrived there will be no delay in commencing operations, but everything will start off briskly without any weary waiting for the fun to begin.

Each man on entering is given a small pink bag on which a red paper heart has been pasted. This contains beans or small discs of gilt paper stuck on cardboard to represent gold dollars. There should be fifteen in some bags and twenty in others so as to make the financial resources of the bidders unequal. The bags however should be all alike on the outside and purposely mixed up by the hostess so that she does not know to whom the larger amounts have been given and thus cannot be accused of favoritism.

In one corner of the parlor an auctioneer's stand made of grocery boxes covered with bright pink silesia and decorated with hearts cut from bright red paper has been placed and in front of this, chairs are arranged in rows as at an auction.

When everybody is seated the auctioneer mounts the platform and begins to praise up his wares. Now what he is really selling are the hearts or at least the "company" for that evening of the various ladies present. But the fun is caused by the fact that no one knows to whom he is alluding not even the fair damsels themselves whose "affections" are being knocked down to the highest bidder. This is the way in which it is managed. For days before the party the hostess has been preparing cards to represent each girl who is to be present. Each of these is numbered and the hostess keeps a private list of names corresponding to the numbers. On each card should be written two or three lines either in verse or prose.

The auctioneer holds up a card for all to see and then with great unction reads the sentiment inscribed upon it.

For example something like this:

"Here's the heart of the sweetest girl in town,
But whether her eyes are blue or brown,
Skin brunette or fair like snow—
Don't ask me, for I don't know."

"Gentlemen what am I bid for this peerless paragon? Positively the sweetest heart in the state. Did I hear a gentleman over there bid three dollars? Three I am bid. Going, going. Four dollars. Thank you. Four dollars, only four dollars for this life's treasure? Five——"

He keeps this up until the bidding stops and the card is sold to the highest bidder.

Other cards are simple prose. One for instance can say: "This heart is the best of company. In her society there is not a dull moment. And her chocolate fudge is the finest ever." Anything which gives a slight description of the girl but does not indicate her so plainly that she is easily identified is permissible. For the fun comes of bidding "in the dark" as it were. In all probability the auction will last for an hour to an hour and one half. If there are more girls than there are men at the party, then the man who has not squandered all his money on the first bid can bid again, on the principle of safety in numbers. If he does not care for his first bid he may get something more to his taste a second time. This doubling up of partners often creates great amusement.

When all the cards have been disposed of, the hostess consulting her secret list pins the correct number on each girl and her partner has to identify her from the number on the card he has purchased. She then becomes his "Valentine" and is obliged by the rules of the game to do her best to entertain him, while he on his part must take her in to supper if refreshments are served in the dining-room or bring them to her if they are passed in the living-room or parlor, and he must also take her home.

Much of the fun of the affair lies in the fact that the girls have no idea whose description is being read by the auctioneer and not until the cards have been purchased and the numbers pinned on their shoulders do they discover to what swains they belong for the evening.

If any would-be buyer finds himself with too little money for the purchase he wishes to make he can borrow from a neighbor willing to lend or can go in debt to his hostess to the amount of five dollars by undertaking to perform afterwards such duties as she may impose. For example he might be asked to write and read aloud a comic Valentine; if he has a singing voice, to sing a love song for the enjoyment of the whole company or do any other "stunt" of which he is capable.

When the auction is over if there is time before supper there might be dancing, or the company can play cards. Hearts of course being the game, and the prize can be candy in a heart-shaped box. Or if none of these pastimes appeal to the hostess she might fill up the time before refreshments with music or general conversation.

The supper can be as simple or as elaborate as desired. It is a pretty idea to have heart-shaped sandwiches. Cut the slices of bread with a heart-shaped cooky cutter and then fill some with minced ham and others with a mixture of cream cheese and chopped English walnuts. Pass with these creamed oysters or chicken salad or salmon or tuna fish salad whichever dish is most convenient for you to serve. The last course can be ice-cream with little heart-shaped cakes, baked in heart-shaped patty pans or cut from slices of loaf cake with a sharp cooky cutter and frosted with icing colored a bright pink with cranberry juice. These can be diversified with hearts frosted with yellow icing, colored with orange juice and also chocolate hearts. Small cups of coffee can be passed or glasses of lemonade or grape juice punch.

In leap year the women should bid for the men. Even this year you might diversify the party by allowing mixed bidding. That is have cards describing some of the girls and some of the men and then giving both women and men whose names are not on the list little bags of beans or imitation gold and allowing them to bid. The people whose cards are being sold can offer all the suggestions and guesses they want to but they cannot bid.

reason I lived so long without getting a divorce was because I considered it my duty to try every means possible to reform my husband. It is no use. Sisters, don't ever make such an attempt. I think divorce should be only a last resort.

I have lived in Idaho for nine years and have been married for the past five years to a good, unselfish man. We are very happy and congenial and though we have no children, we hope to adopt some soon. When I read the letters of sisters who object to equal suffrage it seems pitiable that any woman should be so far behind the times as to want to be of the "clinging vine" variety. That style of a woman does not want to do any thinking for herself. The world will only advance when individual thinking occupies first place. I taught school in different places in Idaho, and have been in this town for five years. I have observed the woman voters. I cannot see that going to the polls has made any of them masculine or "loud" as one sister states. Candidates call upon the ladies and they know they must lead a fairly blameless life in order to obtain the votes of the good women, who are in the majority, I am sure. The husbands of the Idaho women do not appear to show any more neglect because their wives are interested in politics. My husband and I often vote for different candidates for the same office. He feels that I have brains enough and have studied conditions well enough to know my own mind. I do not dictate to him how he shall vote. We discuss and read political affairs same as we would other affairs. It is absurd to say that equal suffrage will despoil the home. Thousands of women are not married and have no homes. Should they have nothing to say about political affairs?

Mrs. Waneta Brownell says no woman can hold office and care for her children. This may be true in most cases, but the child-bearing period does not last during the whole lifetime. Also statistics show that one married woman in ten cannot have children. A woman of forty or fifty who has kept her brain in an active condition should be ready to take part in some of the worth-while work of the world. By the time she is forty if she has not been compelled to bear too many children, she should be free to take up interests outside of her home and children. The chimney corner grandmother is also out of date. Too many women sink into nothingness, as it were, as soon as all their children have flown the home nest. This is a mistake.

The family life as a rule is a very selfish life. Most parents care more for the advancement of their own children than they do for their neighbors. This is natural, but is it in line with the universal brotherhood of man? The selfishness of family, and of nation must be overcome. We are all one family and God is our Father. Why not act as if this were true?

I could write on many subjects connected with this section but I feel that my letter is too long already.

MRS. X. Y. Z.

FLEMING, OHIO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I wonder if Mrs. Wilkinson keeps a goat in her office? If she does know my letter will never reach its destination, but I am going to run the risk anyway. I haven't anything important to talk about, but as it is such a cozy little corner I can't resist the temptation to write.

I live ten miles from Marietta, Ohio, the oldest town on the Ohio river. The Indians were the first to make that city their home, and there is one of their mounds still standing. It is in such a lovely place that a square of land around this mound has been taken for a cemetery; it is called the Mound Cemetery. There are steps up the side of the mound and seats around the top.

There is also an old house that was the first built in Marietta over a century ago. If any of the sisters that live in foreign lands would like to see this quaint old house or the mound, would write, I will send a post-card picture of them.

I am the mother of four children, three girls and a baby boy, three months old.

I see where so many of the sisters are against marrying young. I was married when but fifteen years young and am happy to say I have never regretted it. I have been married over eleven years; each year we seem nearer and dearer to each other. I am like Mrs. Wilkinson in what she said about people living fifty years without having their little family quarrels; there may be some that don't have their disputes. I believe we could easily count ours. The longer a man and wife live together, the more alike they become, and less disputes they have. We women folks have to show our spunk once in a while, or our husbands wouldn't like us half as much.

I wonder if any of the sisters have trouble with sick babies that are artificially fed? My children were all, so-called, "bottle babies" and their little stomachs couldn't stand the cow's milk, and baby's food didn't agree with them. My first baby took sick just as warm weather began, and never got well till it got cool in the fall. We tried everything and nothing did any good until I used rolled oats, cooked and strained. Then I boil the milk and mix equal parts of milk and strained oats, and add a little sugar. Do not salt the oats, and start them cooking in cold water. I have raised my last three children on this and find it excellent and not a bit expensive. I began feeding this to my last baby when he was but three weeks old. I began with two teaspoonfuls of the strained oats to one teaspoonful of pure milk and increased the amount as he got older.

I would like for the sister who wrote telling us about Job's tears to also tell us where we could get a few seeds of them. I would like to raise some as I have heard they were very good for a child to wear while cutting teeth.

I haven't taken COMFORT very long but I think I couldn't live without it. I am getting up a club to get Uncle Charlie's books and I hope to get all I can to go towards Uncle Charlie's Home, but this is a small place, and now that our railroad has stopped so it doesn't look very encouraging at present, but I am going to do my best.

Mrs. Wilkinson, I think so much of your writings I have named my little boy Wheeler. He is just three months old. I had his name waiting for him when he came.

Yours for friendship, MRS. H. L. CARPENTER.

Mrs. Carpenter. Your postscript 'most took my breath away for I did not realize my humble efforts had been appreciated to such an extent. I'd like very much to see little Wheeler but even if that pleasure is denied me, the fact that you have paid me such a high compliment will help me in my daily work and act as an incentive for doing better and nobler things.—Ed.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been reading my October COMFORT and note what Mrs. C. Smith said in regard to divorce. I do not believe in divorce unless it is absolutely necessary. Oftentimes divorce could be avoided if couples would only try. I am going to tell our case. Several years ago we were married. We were both nearly thirty, thought we loved each other and after a very brief courtship, a hasty marriage. It wasn't long before we found we had made an awful mistake and home was anything but pleasant. A trouble-making "in-law" also added to my troubles. Finally I decided I would leave but not secure a divorce. I told my husband what I had decided on and we talked it over. He did not want me to leave so I gave him his choice between the "trouble-maker" and me. He decided in my favor and we finally concluded that as we had promised for "better or for worse" we would try it at least another year. At the end of two years we had a darling baby girl, that both loved dearly. After a long time another one came and I tell you they are the "tie that binds." Twice since our first trouble we have had to talk matters over but we are still living together and although trials come, we both have found that we need each other. He has always been good to me and he loves his two girls dearly. After trying hard, I have come to the conclusion that life would be lots harder without him than it is with him and he will not listen to even a separation.

If this reaches print, I trust it will help some other couple as it has two that we know right near us.

Some states are so easy with their divorce laws, and this one is, that a couple can secure a divorce for almost no cause and some take their "little" troubles to the court instead of trying to find a "better way." I am glad we found the better way.

With best of wishes for one and all, I am,
A well-wishing COMFORT Sister.

MISSOURI.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

The subjects of Woman Suffrage and large families interest me. I am of the same mind regarding large families as Mrs. K. of West Virginia. Our children are very dear to us, therefore we should not bring more of them into the world than we can properly care for or impart strength and health to. We should cooperate with God and nature for the good of our children.

I am in favor of Woman Suffrage because women should help make the laws they are governed by, also I think they would understand laws for the betterment of our children more than the men do because the mothers associate with their children more than their fathers do. As for standing in line with the women of the Red Light districts, I don't think Christ would have minded standing in line with them. Remember what he said to Magdalen. I don't think all of them would vote for the bad for I think most of them would be glad of a chance to vote for the good in order to protect other women; for even if they were "fallen women" it may have been caused by lack of the necessaries of life or through the treachery of our social system. A large number of them would make just as good, true wives and mothers as you or I, if they were only given a chance, so let's not condemn them but lend a strengthening hand.

Love to all, MRS. P.

DEAR READERS:

I will add my mite by telling Mrs. Aldridge to procure a Bible with pictures, or, better still, a book telling Bible stories by means of pictures, and let your boy look at it and tell him the stories. Get him interested first and let the prayers come later. Don't hire him to do anything. I am sixty-six years old and have raised three boys. My youngest is now a minister. I live in the extreme northern part of Wisconsin, in the woods. MRS. C. A. P.

that is, he mined it and loaded it on a car, but hasn't for a year or more. I am sure a coal mine would be a novelty to lots of the sisters.

We live in our own house in the country. I am twenty-four years old, five feet five inches tall and weigh one hundred and thirty-eight pounds. Have brown eyes and hair and dark complexion. My husband is away at present working. Just the little ones and I are here tonight. I feel lonely but know there are many kind hearts and sympathetic friends in the world and lots are more lonely than I.

My mother has heart trouble. Her limbs swell and she can't rest lying down. If anyone knows of a sure or good remedy I would be glad to hear of it.

I would appreciate letters from any who care to write to me.

Your COMFORT sister, MRS. MAUDE HURST.

TEXAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

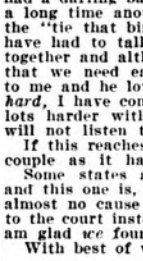
I think COMFORT is a grand paper and rightly named.

Sisters, I am asking your advice. I am twenty-four years old, have been married over seven years to as good a man as could be found anywhere. We are renters and have a good living. Our home is happy, but yet I feel it isn't complete for we have no children and we both love them. But when I think of all it means to bring a child into the world it worries me till I lose control of my nerves. I feel that I never could stand the long months I would have to wait. I want to take an orphan child to raise but my husband objects to that. I am strong enough to give a child good care and we could give one a good and comfortable home and I feel it my duty, if we don't have one of our own, to take one, that has no one to care for it, and give it a mother's love. I want so much to have a little one call me mother. Then it seems that my life would be complete. I want one of my own but it seems before the necessary time elapsed I would be insane. Please advise me what to do.

Waiting your advice. I am, Lonely One.

Lonely One. Like Topsy I'll "fess up" and admit that on reading your letter my first comment was, "She deserves to be lonely," but I'm glad to say I saw immediately the unfairness and injustice of such a remark and I'm quite properly ashamed of myself for it. Even if I knew more about you I would not be justified in judging, and especialy so harshly. You say you are "strong enough to give a child good care," so if your health is good there doesn't seem to be so much cause for you to dread motherhood, but your physician is the one to advise you about that. Consult him and follow his advice, though the sisters may be able to send some cheerful thoughts to you.—Ed.

IDAHO.



DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

For several years I have enjoyed reading the COMFORT sisters' letters and I will now add my mite. The questions of divorce, equal suffrage and large families are subjects that I am qualified to speak on for I am the second of ten children, have been married, divorced and remarried. I have also lived in the Eastern part of the United States, as well as this Western section.

In regard to large families, I am emphatically opposed to them, unless the parents are physically and financially able to give their children at least food, clothing and the privilege of getting all the education they want. At fifteen years of age, I had to go to work to support myself and help support the rest of the family. The same was true of the first five or six of us. We were sacrificed in order to keep the wolf from the door. My father was swamped in the undertaking of supplying the needs of his enormous family long before they were all born. Naturally I was glad to give up the struggle to which there appeared to be no end, and married the first man I thought I was in love with. Home was not a very nice place in which to bring my friends and I married the wrong man.

To make a long story short I lived nine miserable years with a man of drinking habits, a moral degenerate. I could not influence him to change his ways, and no one was benefited by my remaining in such degradation. There were no children, and after trying my best to raise him from the depths into which he was determined to sink, I left him to his own devices and got a divorce. One of the witnesses swore that the man had not been strictly sober for more than a year. Anyone who thinks a woman of refinement and culture should continue such a life, doesn't know what it means to live in such mental misery. The only heaven ought to put years on the lives of many a tired, overworked girl. To get away from the artificialities and restrictions of every-day life, to get away from the mushy talk of pesky boys, and to get away (and I hope that is one of the rules of the club) from the eternal mirror, the powder puff, the rouge pot and the cold cream can, to get away from the primping and the fussing and the fixing, the worrying and the stewing, as to how you look and how you don't look, ought to do you girls all the good in the world. About ninety per cent of you spend all your time worrying about your looks, and all the worrying and all the fussing and the primping, if you are homely only makes you worse, and if you are good looking, tends to make you homely. When you girls get away by the side of a stream in a forest glade, and you don't have to worry whether your nose is too big or too little, and you can smile from ear to ear, without fearing that the paint will crack or the store teeth show, and your hair can hang like a bunch of dead rats' tails, without you flying to that infernal abomination called the curling iron, and your nails can grow any old fashion, without your getting out a bunch of tools and a dozen flatirons to polish them, then my dears you are beginning to live. By the way if you girls spent half the time polishing your brains that you do polishing your nails, you'd be intellectual companions, charming chums delightful mates, for even a college professor. While you girls are polishing your nails and cheeks, neglecting your brains the while, the boys are polishing their teeth with cigarette smoke and their stomachs with alcohol. That's a fine combination, the painted girl and the pickled man. Do you wonder that such a combination floods the world with nuts, boobs and boneheads, inefficients, incompetents and imbeciles. How could it be otherwise? It is to counteract these degenerate tendencies of our race that a few thinking men and women have started such organizations as the Boy Scouts and the Camp Fire Girls' Clubs, not forgetting the Boy Pioneers. Organization and cooperation are the most tremendous and forceful wonder working words in the dictionary of civilization. It is justice that will solve humanity's ills, but only as men and women organize and cooperate will we be able to secure justice from those who grow fat on privilege and oppression. If you girls get healthy bodies you will be in a fair way to get healthy minds. With organization and healthy minds and strong bodies you ought to start cleaning up the world and making it a worth-while place to live in. The men ought to do it, but they never will until you shame them into doing it. Here are three cheers for the Camp Fire Girls' Club. Go to high school no matter what the distance may be.

HEISKELL, TENN.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I will write you to let you know that I got my button and membership certificate. I am very much pleased with them. I go to school every day. I went to school every day the last two years. I am in the sixth grade. I study the folling books: Arithmetic, Tennessee History, grammer, Georgraphy, U. S. History, Physiology, and Spelling.

Uncle Charlie, you got my name and another boy's name mixed up. I was thirteen years old the 26th day of August. I live thirteen miles from Knoxville, Tenn.

Yours truly,
H. MCDONALD. (League No. 42,248).

Herbert, I am sorry I got your name mixed up with that of some other boy. I'm willing to bear a part of the blame for that wicked deed, but most of you boys and girls write so atrociously we have to guess half the time just what your names are, and sometimes we don't guess right. It is time the educational authorities did one of two things, supplied typewriters, or taught children how to use a pen. If you could see Maria, the Goat and myself, all standing on our heads trying to decipher some of the names and addresses that are sent to us, honestly you would pity us. It is not so easy for me to stand on my head as it used to be thirty years ago. I had a good head of hair until I suddenly found myself uncle to several millions of America's best young people. Now my head is as devoid of hair as a duck's egg is devoid of whiskers. So you study the "folling" books do you? Won't you tell us what "folling" books are, Herbert? I just live for books and by books, and anything new in the book line is of profound interest to me, so I do hope you will tell us what "folling" books are. What's that Billy the Goat? Herbert means following books? Thank you William, old socks, I'm so glad you explationed matters, for I honestly did not know what Herbert was getting at. One can't be too careful about spelling, Herbert. A poor woman the other day wrote me that she and her four daughters needed clothes, and incidentally she added that "They all had bear feet," and would like some shoes. Just imagine four young ladies with bear feet. What a sensation they'd cause. People with bear feet couldn't wear shoes anyway, and what is more would not need them. Nature has provided the bear with excellent foot gear, and anybody who has bear feet isn't liable to get cold feet or chilblains. The lady of course meant to write "bare" feet. It is not much use your studying grammar, if you don't even know how to spell the subject you are going to study. You have got to swallow that tired feeling Herbert when you are writing and spelling. You only wrote half the letter n. Anything that is worth doing is worth doing well. Boys and girls who write for publication should do their best instead of being so utterly indifferent that they succeed only in doing their worst. You have a fine name Herbert. Great things have been accomplished by men who bore your name. Try my dear boy and see that it stands for something better than carelessness.

TACOMA, WASH.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

This is the first time that I have written and I hope that when you receive this letter, Billy the Goat will not be hungry.

Now Uncle, what do you think about this. A short time ago I read, in a daily paper, an article about a man who said that the children of today have to study too hard. The idea of boys and girls of fifteen and sixteen being compelled to laboriously murder thirty or forty undeserving lines of Cicero or Cæsar every day and to have command of two or three other languages. Don't you think he is right, Uncle? I do.

Uncle, if it doesn't take too long won't you please write a poem about a Tacoma girl?

I think I have already stayed too long so I must go. Your niece, ELVA WILLIAMS.

Why didn't you give your street number child? Never cause government officials or anyone else for that matter unnecessary trouble. Your address is doubtless on the outside of your envelope, but as I haven't your envelope, those who feel prompted to write will probably have their letters returned. Yes, the idea of boys and girls being compelled to stand an hour or so daily murdering thirty or forty lines of Cicero or Cæsar is absurd. Children who know little or nothing of their own language trying to master a dead language is preposterous. If we could all stay at school until we were thirty years of age, and could live until we were a hundred and fifty, we could afford to waste a little time on Greek and Latin, but when one thinks how brief are the days of youth and especially one's school days, it seems a crime they should be wasted in acquiring a useless smattering of dead languages. This monkeying with Latin and Greek, algebra, euclid, etc., is excused on the ground that it develops the intellect and sets the machinery of thought and reason in action, just as gymnastics develop the muscles of the body. That is all true, but if the mind has to be stropped and honed before it can have an intellectual edge, let it be rubbed against the facts and realities and problems of present-day life, instead of the musty past. What children want and what grown ups need most of all and what they don't get is a thorough knowledge of the body and how to take care of it; a knowledge of their duty toward God, their neighbor, the state, society and all mankind. When you come to think that there are millions of people who cast a vote for president every four years without knowing what they are voting for, you can see that there is something wrong with our education. What is the good of living in a world at all if you don't know anything about the world you are living in, and few do know anything about it. Did you ever stop to think that there are tens of thousands of children born into this world every year, ready in every way to accommodate themselves to a civilization five thousand years in advance of the sham civilization we have today? We are trying to prepare children for the world, but that is the wrong way to do business. We should prepare the world for the children. All that the modern school attempts is to fit children for business careers, and what pray is a business career? Putting sand in sugar, poison in food, adulteration, misrepresentation, doing your

Everbearing Strawberries In the Editor's Garden

The many inquiries we have received about the everbearing strawberries suggested the idea that COMFORT readers might be interested in the editor's experience in raising these berries in his own garden. As the writer, who is not of the agricultural staff which conducts our "Modern Farmer" department, has very little knowledge of gardening he does not pretend to teach the correct method of cultivating these berries, but merely describes the results obtained by his somewhat crude treatment which ought to be equalled or surpassed under ordinary conditions of the home garden.

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

A YEAR ago last spring, having decided to start a strawberry bed, I ordered 200 plants of a standard summer variety, and the nurseryman who furnished them talked me into buying 50 plants of an everbearing variety at one dollar a dozen. Although I knew him to be reliable, I was somewhat skeptical of the claims he put forth in favor of the everbearing strawberries, but they have certainly made good. They are frequently called "fall-bearing," but that is only another name for the same thing.

I set the plants of both varieties in the ground early in May, as soon as the land was fit to work. Suitable compost not being obtainable I used phosphate and wood ashes for fertilizer the first season.

Nearly every plant lived, and by the first of June both varieties were in bloom. I picked all the blossoms, as instructed by the nurseryman. And right here begins the difference between the summer and the everbearing varieties.

The blossoms have to be picked because the newly rooted plants would be injured if their vitality were permitted to go into fruit. As the summer varieties blossom only once a year, by picking the blossoms the first season you get no fruit from these plants until the second summer.

But as soon as the blossoms on my everbearers were picked another set of buds started and shortly they were full of blossoms again, which in turn had to be picked and were followed by more blossoms. From then until the first of August picking strawberry blossoms was a daily diversion. It was like picking pansies; the more blooms I picked the more they blossomed. And all the while the plants were making a splendid growth.

By the first of August my everbearers had become so strong and sturdy—some of them had begun to send out runners—that I thought it safe to let them bear, and so I stopped the blossom picking on that day. At the same time I sprinkled a little phosphate and wood ashes around each plant and worked it into the top soil, taking care not to scratch deep enough to disturb the strawberry roots. I also kept the bed clear of weeds, which is absolutely essential to success with any kind of strawberries.

The latter part of August I began picking ripe strawberries, smooth, round, dark red, delicious fruit of good size; and from that on until the ground froze that little everbearing bed was in continual performance. At the same time and always there were berries ripening, green berries maturing, blossoms opening and new buds forming.

Frosts come early in Maine; a light frost is not uncommon early in September and it is rare that we escape a heavy frost in the latter part of that month; although we have some warm, sunny weather in October the nights are cold and late in the month the surface of the ground is likely to be stiffened with frost in the early mornings to thaw again as the sun gets up. These climatic conditions are mentioned to show what my everbearers had to contend with.

October 31, 1915, the day I closed my summer home where I had my garden, I picked ripe strawberries; the plants were still blossoming and held green fruit in various stages of development, but what they did after that I can't say for I did not see them again until the next spring.

This seemed wonderful as there had been light frosts in September, heavy frosts in October and several times the green berries had frozen and thawed, yet kept on growing and ripening.

The facts I have stated are the literal truth but, like most facts, require an explanation to convey a true idea of the actual effective results.

Through September the weather for the most part was fairly warm and despite a few frosts the plants bore well and the berries grew with normal rapidity and maintained the full flavor and delicacy that characterized the August fruiting. But in October, as the weather became colder the growth and ripening of the fruit was slower and the yield lessened proportionately, although the individual berries attained about the same size as ever. The berries ripened in the cold weather had less flavor and were not so mellow but, strange to say, were fully as sweet as in summer. The late berries even when green seemed to be almost totally lacking acidity.

Thus closed my first season's experiment. Late in November I had both beds covered with a light mulching of second crop hay which contained no seed. When the covering—what was left of it—was taken off in April every plant was alive and thrifty, although other strawberry beds in the vicinity that were more heavily covered suffered severely by winter-killing. Some stray cattle ate up the greater part of my mulching and the rest of it nearly all blew off, leaving the plants with little if any protection until the snow came in February. It was an unfavorable winter, the snow not coming until so late, and previous to that much rain and freezing and thawing. My exemption from winter-killing probably was due to the perfectly graded slope of the land which prevented any water standing or ice forming over either bed.

I was so well satisfied with the behavior of my everbearers that last spring I bought 300 more of the same variety and 300 of another everbearing variety. Although these plants came in good condition they got a bad set-back through not being set out for nearly two weeks because of a long rainy spell which kept the ground too muddy to work. About a quarter of them died and those that lived had a poor start.

My summer cottage is at the seaside where barn manure is not obtainable, so I drew on the resources of old Ocean for a substitute. The fall before I had rockweed stripped from the ledges at low tide, hauled to the garden and stacked. By spring this was pretty well rotted and had shrunken to less than half its original bulk.

For my new strawberries I had furrows run about three feet apart and put into them about four inches of the rotted rockweed; then covered it with about four inches of earth which filled the furrows even with the surface of the ground. The plants were set eighteen inches apart in the rows, and a little phosphate, wood ashes and bone meal sprinkled close around each plant and scratched into the top soil.

These plants began blossoming before I could get them set, which, as explained, was delayed by wet weather, and the blossom picking process of the previous summer was repeated on the new ones until about the first of August. At that time I sprinkled a little phosphate, wood ashes and nitrate of soda close to the plants and hilled the earth up about them with a hoe. Most of them had grown well and were making runners which I trained to keep in the rows by putting a little earth on them near their ends. The fruiting results were a repetition of those of the previous season only on a proportionately larger scale.

Now about the second season's behavior of my two old beds. I kept the blossoms picked from my old everbearers until June 20 for the purpose of having them follow on the heels of the crop from my bed of summer berries which were late because of the late, cold spring. My summer berries were in bearing a little over two weeks beginning with the fourth of July, and before they were gone I picked the first ripe fruit from the everbearers, though the latter had not come into full bearing at that time because I had kept up the blossom picking too long; next season I shall stop it two weeks earlier. But that little old everbearing bed certainly did well after it got going. It bore abundantly through August and well in September, but by October it was becoming choked by the growth of the hundreds of young plants it had produced, so I dug it up, using the young plants and some of the old ones to make a larger bed. I had made the mistake the year previous of setting these plants too closely, a foot apart in rows two feet apart, which did not allow space for the growth of the runners. Thus ended the career of the first bed of everbearers, but the two new beds were still yielding as previously described.

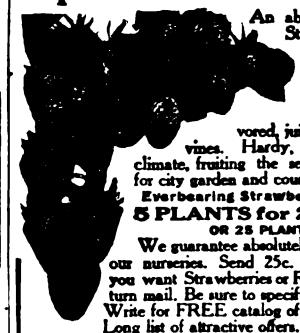
Last season I had strawberries in my garden continually from the fourth of July until the twelfth day of November, when I picked the last ripe berries—only a few and they did not have much flavor then—and there were many green berries and blossoms on the plants. The wonder is that there could be any ripe berries considering that the ground froze hard the night before and had frozen and thawed several times not to mention the heavy frosts during the previous three weeks. The same day, a few hours after I picked my last ripe strawberries, a snow-storm set in which left a good six inches of snow on the ground.

I have seen pictures of people brushing the snow from a bed of everbearers and picking ripe strawberries. Had I postponed my last picking twenty-four hours I could have performed that trick myself.

From my experience of two seasons I have no hesitation in recommending the everbearing, otherwise called the fall-bearing, strawberry as a valuable addition to the home garden and I see no reason why it should not be profitable to grow it for the market. Until its cultivation becomes common this fruit should command a fancy price as it can be made to come when other strawberries are out of season.

The everbearing strawberries have enough good and strong points without making any extravagant claims in their favor. I would not advise anybody to expect to dig many ripe berries from under the snow or to rely on much of a yield after the heavy frosts begin to strip the trees of leaves, though it is a fact that we had fresh berries on the table all through October and a surplus to can every week in the month. Another peculiarity was that although the berries grown in cold weather lacked flavor when eaten raw, if cooked they developed quite as much flavor as those produced in warm weather and we thought they made even better preserves. I also found that if picked when fully grown and just beginning to change color they ripened pretty well in the house.

I believe they have another limitation which it is fair to consider. They will blossom and, if permitted, will bear as early as the ordinary strawberries and will keep on bearing for some months—how long I do not know because I have not tested the limit of their capacity—but it is unreasonable to believe that they can keep on bearing indefinitely without exhausting the strength of the plants although they make longer roots than the ordinary varieties. Therefore it is advisable to pick the early blossoms so not to let them fruit until after the ordinary strawberries are gone. The object is to save their strength to produce heavily when there are no other strawberries in the market.



However, in sections subject to late spring frosts likely to kill the blossoms of the ordinary strawberries and prevent them from fruiting, it would seem advisable to substitute the everbearing and thus make sure of a good crop regardless of weather; for if the first blossoms are killed the everbearers will immediately start a new set.

I omitted to say that early last spring I gave my old everbearing bed a light top dressing of phosphate, bone meal and wood ashes, and in midsummer I gave it an application of phosphate, wood ashes and nitrate of soda. It stands to reason that plants which bear so abundantly and so long must require more feeding than those which produce but one crop a year. Other fertilizers might do as well and perhaps better; I used these because they were available and others were not.

I know very little about strawberry culture and my only excuse for writing is to give our readers the results of my limited experience with the everbearing which is attracting so much attention at present. Authoritative advice as to best methods of cultivation can be had from those who have made a specialty of propagating these plants. A little book on strawberry culture that I bought last spring for twenty-five cents contained much valuable information and proved a good investment.

Something About Blackheads

SO many of my girls write me complaining of blackheads, asking how to get rid of them, what causes them, and why they have blackheads when Annabelle and Polly and Blanche have such good smooth skins.

You'll all be tremendously surprised at my answer, and I'm hesitating just a bit before giving it, because you're going to be horrified as well!

However, here it is. A blackhead is nothing but a little speck of dirt which has lodged in a pore and has not been sufficiently coaxed to come out! Look in the mirror and see if you can discover any of these disfiguring specks on your own face, then let me tell you how to get rid of them.

First of all, you need a complexion brush—not only need, but must have it. It should be of camel's hair, which is soft and so will cleanse without scratching the skin. A stiff brush will do damage to the delicate cuticle.

Then you must provide yourself with the purest and simplest of soaps.

Every night before going to bed, scrub the face—as I have many times advised—with hot soapy water and your brush, being sure to cleanse the little creases at each side of the nose, the corners of the mouth, the chin—all, places where dirt is apt to lodge in the pores.

If you let your treatment go at this, you will still have blackheads, for the soap in the water will itself clog the pores—therefore, you must rinse and rinse and rinse the face many times in warm water, then in cool, and finally in very cold water dashed on, which helps to close the pores.

Never use hot water, then very cold water immediately after, as this cracks the skin, but make the transition gradually, hot, very warm, warm, tepid, cool, cold.

After your facial bath, massage in cold cream thoroughly, and slap the face all over lightly with flattened fingers, until the blood tingles beneath the skin. In the morning, wash in tepid water (no soap), and finally in cold water.

After massaging in the cream at night, try gently to squeeze out any prominent blackheads. You can use a comedone extractor—a little instrument like half a pair of tweezers with a tiny hole in one end. Place hole over blackhead and press gently. In buying an extractor, be sure the edges of the little hole are rounded and smooth, not sharp, so they will not break the skin.

For obstinate blackheads, which do not yield to the above treatment in a week's time, massage into the skin (after the complexion scrub at night), a little boric powder, applying a tiny bit of cold cream afterward. Every seventh night, steam the face over a basin of boiling water—covering the head with a Turkish towel held out in front over the basin to keep the steam under it. Do this for ten minutes, rinse in hot water, then cover skin with a blackhead jelly made by paring one small cake of Castle soap into three cups of water to which a teaspoonful of powdered borax has been added, the whole boiled and let stand until jellied. This jelly should remain on the face for ten minutes, then be washed off and cold cream massaged into the skin. Keep up this treatment only until the skin is free from blackheads.

Answers to Questions

Miss E. G.—There is nothing I can do to help about your broken nose. You should go to a physician, although I do not believe there is any way, now, of straightening it. I am sorry not to be of use.

Lena.—If your height is five feet five inches, and your hip measure thirty-three, you can still increase your hip measurement a little more than five inches before you will be in any danger of even starting on being overgrown. For your age—fourteen—however, it is better not to have attained the full measurement for your height—that belongs with twenty or more. Your waist measure, twenty-seven, is about right—you might even add another inch without going over the correct measurements, so you see you are not in the slightest danger of getting too large. Your height is all right—be thankful! Probably you could weigh quite a little more, and as you grow older the pounds will begin to come as they should. At fourteen, it is foolish to worry about one's weight, height, size, or anything else, for all these things are in process of change, and you—just like the rest of us—will have to wait a little time until the changes take place. No, you are not too large to let your curls hang. Why not tie the front half of the hair at the crown of the head, then let the ends of this part join the back half, and fasten all together just below the head—at the nape of the neck—with a ribbon bow or a large shell pin, letting the curls hang straight down from this? For your freckles, wear broadbrimmed hats when spring comes round again, rub cold cream on the face and wipe off carefully before going outdoors, and dab lemon juice at night on the offending spots. Probably your freckles are not so very obstinate and will go away with this treatment, especially after a rest all winter, during which you can use lemon juice on the face occasionally, letting it dry on at night.

Worried.—I don't wonder you are distressed about your hair, but from what you tell me about using many tonics, brushing it, massaging the scalp, etc., I am inclined to believe that your big trouble lies with the condition of your body. Unless the blood is rich and pure, you cannot have healthy hair, for it does not get proper nourishment. I suggest, therefore, that, while keeping up the gentle brushing—one hundred strokes a night—and shampooing once in two weeks (not oftener, and with dry hair you may go three weeks), and massaging the scalp, you spend a good deal of time getting your body into better shape. Make it a point to eat very nourishing food, to drink eight or ten glasses of water a day, to sleep eight or nine hours at least, to walk in the open air when you can. The milk diet for six weeks or two months would more than likely put your hair back in shape by toning your whole body up, adding flesh, purifying the blood. The two formulas you suggest will not be of any great help, I fear—neither could do you any injury. The massage and brushing, plus attention to the diet, to the eliminative functions, to sleep and exercise, will do a thousand times more.

Betty.—Indeed, you can make your finger nails look pretty, even if you have neglected them until you are twenty. Invest in a good nail brush, a small blunt orange-wood stick, a pair of manicure scissors, a cuticle knife, and a very thin flexible nail file. Scrub your nails thoroughly on going to bed, and every time you wash your hands, and clean them always immediately after, using your orange-wood stick. At night rub vaseline around the nail where it goes into the flesh. In the morning, during your first free time, sit down with a bowl of warm soapy water (very soapy). First, use your nail file and file the edge of the nail, shaping it into an oval. If you have worn your nails even with the finger, never mind, for they will grow out and then you can shape them. In such case, merely use the file to make the edges even, and round the ends a trifle. Next dip your orange-wood stick in the soapy water and carefully cleanse under the nail. Do the same with the right hand. Then soak the left hand in the bowl for five minutes, dry lightly, and using the cuticle knife gently loosen any skin which may have grown to the nail. Sometimes inside of the real scarf-skin at the base of the nail, will be little extra layers of skin which you can scrape off with the cuticle knife, but be careful not to break the scarf-skin. Use the blunt end of your orange-wood stick to press the scarf-skin gently back from the nail at its base. To begin with, your efforts will not seem to be very successful, but after you have done this daily for a week or more, you will be surprised to observe the real improvement that has taken place. Do not cut the cuticle at the base of the nail, if you can possibly avoid it—try pushing it back for a week or more before you resort to cutting it: as, once cut, it must be kept cut, and it is quite likely that by daily treatment of the nails in the manner directed, the skin will finally stay back of itself disclosing a half moon at the base of the nails. File the nails only about twice a week, as they will not need it oftener. If you are inclined to hangnails, invest in a pumice stone, and rub the sides of the finger gently, when a hangnail appears. You can use your manicure scissors first to remove it, then rub with the pumice stone to rid your finger of any remaining bit of the hangnail. Be careful to use your nail brush on your nails every time you wash your hands, and to clean them while still damp, with the orange-wood stick. This is a very simple way to treat the nails, but still make yours very good looking in a short time. As to your blackheads, read what I have to say this month in my little chat with my girls, and follow the directions. You will not be troubled again, if you are faithful in well doing.

Lottie H.—Do not attempt to dye your own hair switch. An amateur invariably makes a wreck of the hair. You will merely spoil your switch, and need a new one. Send it to a professional hair dyer—you can get addresses from the advertising pages of the magazines. How has the switch turned "almost red?" Probably you have washed it in soapy water, or done something of that kind. Ask the dyer to whom you send your hair how you should wash it, after it has been redyed.

V. P. C.—If your forehead begins to look flabby, and the skin is losing its firmness, I think your body needs building up. See answer to "Discouraged." In the meantime, while you are thus giving the skin the elements it needs to rejuvenate it, and are perhaps building up the tissues beneath it to prevent wrinkling, massage the forehead nightly with cold cream, after cleansing thoroughly. When through massaging, lay hot cloths over it, changing as fast as they get cool, and keep up for five minutes. Then place a cold wet cloth over the forehead and replace as it warms up. This closes the pores and firms the skin.

Discouraged, T. F. M.—I am sorry you cannot continue to get the milk you need, as the milk diet is exactly the thing to make you gain in weight. That one week, you see, did wonders for your complexion. I am glad you are drinking the amount of water you state—nine glasses a day. Keep this up. To gain on solid food, you must be careful to choose fat-building foods. You see, some foods just give you muscle, and others contain mineral salts and water—what you need are the ones which make fat. These are potatoes (baked, preferably—never fried), rice, macaroni, all cereals, milk, cream, butter, fat meat, sugar. You must be sure to take plenty of fruits, also, although they are not fat-building. I suggest that, for breakfast, you have some fruit—grape-fruit, pineapple, an orange, a baked apple, some stewed prunes (soak twelve hours, then simmer gently until thoroughly soft), apple sauce, stewed dried apricots (prepare as you do the prunes), sliced banana and orange, baked pear. The grapefruit and oranges are probably the best for you. Next, eat a big heaping dish of cereal which has been cooked for a long time in a double boiler, or in one small kettle set inside another full of boiling water. With this eat cream and sugar, and hot buttered toast. Eat plenty of the cereal. Follow with two soft-boiled eggs (two and one half or three minutes), or two soft-poached eggs, or some soft scrambled eggs—the former is preferable. For lunch you could have creamed chipped beef, and baked potato and some other vegetable, stewed celery, spinach, canned tomato, canned corn in milk, etc., etc. And for dessert you could have canned fruit (not too sweet preserves, however), or some blanc mange with cream, or a baked custard. For dinner have meat in some form, or fish. Salt meats are not to be desired, although palatable once in a while. I do not know whether you are where you can get good steaks or roasts. Rare roast beef, roast lamb or mutton, a lamb or mutton chop (not too well done), rare broiled steak (never eat any fried meat), chicken fricasseed or roasted or in any form, fish broiled or baked, are all good for you. With this eat potatoes or rice, and some other vegetable. Soup would be excellent to begin your meal, and indeed soup makes one very good dish for lunch, and could be used in place of the creamed chipped beef in the above menu. Stick to simple desserts, and avoid pie and cake. As to beverages, it is better not to drink with your meals, but if you feel the need of something confine yourself to one cup thereof. Try to get a certain amount of exercise every day—outdoors if you can, but, if not, in your bedroom. In four weeks, on this diet, you should gain considerably, although never as rapidly as on the milk diet.

O. O. D.—You speak of "large dark pores under your eyes." Do you mean dark circles, or do you actually mean the little pores full of blackheads? If the former, your health is at fault, and you should

Expert Handling of Seeds

THE business of collecting, grading, testing and preserving seeds is a science and an art. Science is knowledge classified and systematized. Art is the application of such knowledge to practise and the combination requires long years of study and experience, large capital, expert, efficient help, elaborate and costly buildings, special machinery and a modern storage equipment.

The average farmer would be astounded, interested, instructed and entertained by a tour of inspection through a great up-to-date city seed warehouse. He would not have to walk a step, but would be given a comfortable seat in an electric run-about and quickly taken up and down long aisles among stacked sacks and bins of seed of all sorts, where busy workmen may be seen sorti , weighing, sacking, moving and shipping orders or handling stored seeds. Every possible mechanical contrivance is here for dealing with seeds. Millet, for example, is being handled in one section of a great floor, for much corn has failed to germinate this cold, wet, backward season, when unreliable, badly cured, low germination seed too commonly was planted, and now a late seeded forage crop must be sown. The millet, in lots of 100 pounds, automatically measured and weighed is shot into sacks which sweep away as if by magic to be stitched shut by machinery and again picked up and carried by trolley to other departments. The work is done perfectly, in record time, and it is evident that the customer is not going to be kept waiting in this rush season when a delay might spell failure. Away goes our runabout again, curving in and out, expertly steered and never striking a sack or measure and when one floor has been inspected it enters an elevator and soon is repeating, one by one, the process on the floors above. A book might well be written on the myriad phases of this great business, tracing each of the thousands of varieties of seeds from the producer through many hands to the great wholesale seed warehouse. Think of the monumental task necessitated by the correct naming, grading, classifying, testing, storing and distributing of all of these seeds and remember that the reputation of a great firm is at stake in every item of the work from start to finish. That reputation takes many years to attain. It is slowly and gradually earned, but unfortunately can be lost in a year and so it is safeguarded by every possible means and added to at every opportunity.

It is because of this expertness based upon knowledge and long experience and made certain and constant by a deserved and treasured reputation that the user of seeds of any kind will conserve his best interests and be surest of succeeding by giving the established reputable seed firm his patronage. The truth of this assertion becomes evident many times each year as we talk with farmers or read their letters. Often they confess their failures and ask advice that success may attend their efforts another year. For instance, one man told us a few days ago that some of his corn matured sufficiently last fall to be serviceable for seed and he counted on receiving five dollars or more a bushel for the thirty bushels he selected and hung up in the buggy shed to dry. But his hopes were blasted in spring and that selected seed corn was fed to the hogs; for the man had no facilities for kiln drying the corn and it froze and thawed out and froze again in the shed and so lost its germinating powers. He offered it for sale and the first would-be purchaser asked "What percentage of purity and germination do you guarantee?" The owner had to answer that the corn was just a good kind of yellow dent that he had grown for years, but he could not say anything about its germinating powers. Then the buyer balked, but advised the farmer to have the corn tested for germination at the state agricultural experiment station. He did so and soon learned that three tests showed an average germination of 84 per cent. That was far too low and being an honest man he stopped trying to sell the corn for seed, and being also a sensible man he brought a named variety of pedigreed yellow dent corn, from a reliable seedsman in a neighboring town, on a guaranty of 99 per cent purity and 97 per cent germination. We passed his field of corn the other day and the stand was fine and a beautiful thing to see in comparison with fields of corn on neighboring farms where home grown, imperfectly cured and consequently low germinating corn was planted. On these farms many fields had to be replanted with sound seed and on some of them some variety of millet, or "billion dollar grass," or rape, or rutabagas was put in as a catch crop, where corn had failed to make a profitable stand.

Too often the farmer, truck gardener or kitchen gardener becomes self-satisfied with home grown and saved seeds, because he knows no difference. We once ran across an old man who was raising old-fashioned, deeply grooved tomatoes and who knew nothing about the modern smooth, plump, round, meaty sort, the seed of which he could have bought from any seedsman. It would be well for every farmer to get out of this rut of content with the old varieties of farm and garden seeds, and flowers and trees and shrubs that satisfied his father and grandfather, patronize the expert seedsman and enjoy and reap profit from the wonderful new and better varieties that science has originated, perfected and then kept safe, sound and pure in the seed stores and nurseries of the trained and experienced experts whose advertisements bring them and their wares to the attention of farm folk in every section of the country and whose instructive catalogues can be had free for the asking.

Better Potatoes

Plant Best Northern Grown Seed

In the chief potato producing districts a move is becoming general to improve the quality of the annual crop of tubers. It has been found that there was no uniformity as to variety or type of potatoes raised in certain communities. When each farm delivered its surplus stock of tubers to the dealer at the railroad station he found himself possessed of potatoes of every possible kind, mixture, size, quality and shape and had to sell the crop as "mixed stock." Such stock has to be laboriously and expensively hand-sorted before it is marketed in the city and the expense of this work eventually falls upon the producer. The buyer has to discriminate against mixed stocks and all diseased and damaged tubers.

Recognizing these facts, after having them pointed out and "rubbed in" by experts of the state agricultural experiment stations and federal department of agriculture, producers of potatoes are organizing community and state associations for the improvement of their product. The first step has been to decide upon a few standard sorts of potatoes especially adapted for the particular district in which they are to be grown and make th se the specialty of the association or community. Each farmer then has a standard variety of tubers to sell to the dealer and if he is wise he offers sorted stock, freed of diseased and damaged tubers and alike in shape, size and trueness of type. The result has been a great increase in demand for potatoes raised in such districts, much of the stock going elsewhere for seed, and naturally there has been a proportionate increase in the price paid for the improved product.

While such work is best done by community organization, its principle should apply with equal force and profit on every farm where potatoes are raised for market and, indeed, the same fundamental principles underlie the successful production and sale of any farm commodity.

In seeking to improve the potato the following objects should be kept in view: 1. Suitability of the variety chosen for the soil and climate of the district in which it is to be grown. 2. Purity, hardiness and healthiness of seed tubers. 3. Cooking quality. 4. Keeping qualities. 5. Roundness, smoothness, white skin and shallowness of eyes.

A frequent change of seed is necessary in some districts as potatoes tend to "run out" in quality and trueness to type and also may become diseased when long grown in the same locality. Rotation of crops also is necessary to lessen these tendencies. Disease is sure to prove a scourge if potatoes are grown year after year on the same field. As a general rule it is well to buy Northern grown seed tubers for planting on Southern soil and all seed should be free from scab, well ripened and free from black or hollow hearts.

The cooking quality is of supreme importance and too little considered. A good potato should be white, mealy and dry when cooked and should stay white in color. Poor varieties darken in color when boiled and also are wet and lumpy. The best quality of cooking potato usually is grown upon friable, sandy loams and in a cool climate.

The rough, deep-eyed potato is objectionable as there is much loss in peeling to say nothing of the additional work and trouble of preparing such tubers for the pot. The round, smooth white potato also is more attractive to the eye and so sells better on the market.

Start New Crops on a Small Scale

A lady reader wrote us the other day that having seen a good deal about sunflower growing for seed she had decided to put in a field of fifteen acres to this crop as her first attempt. She did not even know for sure that her soil or district was adapted for the growing of sunflowers, although that might well be the case as she lived in a semi-arid country where sunshine is plentiful almost every day and where crops grow well when irrigated. We sincerely hope that she will make an entire success of the project. But! hers is the wrong way to start.

On general principles we have to advise that it is unwise and unsafe to start a new crop on a large scale. Better far to put in a couple of rows of sunflowers, or a patch of any other new crop the first year, then give it first-class attention and see how it "pans out." If it proves to be successful in the particular district where it is tried and the person growing it likes the work and did not find it too irksome then a bigger patch or a whole field may be planted the following year.

Last summer we paid a visit to the fine farm at an Indian school and were first shown the standard crops in the big fields and then taken to an enclosure filled with experimental plots on which we found growing several varieties of millet, soy beans, Alfalfa, Soudan grass and other novelties. The superintendent told us that by using that plot year after year he had been able to introduce some very profitable crops without loss from experimentation. He said: "I soon find out by this method what is good and what is worthless and then I stick to that which is good."

A sensible plan surely and one that may well be followed upon every large farm, or public institution farm; but remember that if one wants to know at once whether or not to seed land to a new crop and has no time to experiment for himself he can quickly obtain the necessary information and advice by writing to the director of the agricultural experiment station of his State.

Cold Weather Care of Dairy Cattle

It has been frequently said that the dairy cow is a machine that takes the raw products of the farm and converts them into milk from which are derived various manufactured products, all of which are fit for human consumption. It has also been pointed out that, on the above basis, the dairy cow is the one most economical producer of human food. It is easily shown that the dairy cow converts about thirty-five per cent of the digestible nutrients in her feed into milk solids, all of which are available for the nutrition of the human body. When the same feeds are fed to other animals less than ten per cent of the nutrients are converted into meat, which, with the single exception of eggs, is the only other form of animal food. Or, to put it in other words, there are three forms of animal food,—meat, milk and eggs,—and the dairy cow is capable of producing this food in the form of milk at the least cost.

But the dairy cow cannot do this without the best of care. It is only under proper care that this high ratio of utilization of feed can be maintained. We have said that it is possible for a cow to convert thirty-five per cent of the nutrients found in her feed into human food. By this we mean that if the digestible protein, fat, sugar and starch in the feed which she eats during a week be calculated, it is possible to recover thirty-five per cent of the total amount of these nutrients in the form of protein, butter fat and milk sugar in the milk, produced during the same period of time.

In order to do this, however, she must be intelligently fed, carefully watered, properly housed and given the best of care and attention. A sudden chill, such as may be caused by drinking too cold water or being turned out in the barnyard on a raw and windy day, may cause a drop in this high efficiency to twenty per cent. Insufficient or improper feed will immediately cause a big drop. This high efficiency is wholly impossible if the cows are housed in a cold or otherwise uncomfortable stable. It is quite probable that on the average American farm during the winter months less than five per cent of the nutrients fed to dairy cattle are converted into human food.

1. The first thing to do is to keep the cows comfortable. This means good, warm, light, dry, clean and well ventilated stables. Nothing else will do. The stables need not be expensive but they must be warm, light, dry, clean and well ventilated.

2. The second thing to do is to feed liberally. Cows should be fed according to the amount of milk they are capable of producing; hence no two cows should receive the same amount of feed. Each cow should be watched and fed according to production.

3. The third consideration is to feed the right kind of feed. A large amount of timothy hay, no matter how well cured, is a poor ration for a dairy cow. Clover hay is much better, and clover hay and silage is still better. Alfalfa and silage beats clover hay and silage, but Alfalfa, bran and silage combined in the right proportion is better still. Where silage is not available, roots may be substituted. But this is too big a problem to discuss adequately here.

4. The fourth rule to follow is this: Feed dairy cattle in the barn. They must not be fed outside during the winter, no matter how good the ration. Running to a straw stack is the worst possible practise.

5. Warm the water for dairy cows and give them plenty of it. The best temperature is about sixty degrees. Ice cold water chills them, hence during winter a tank heater must be used or the water must be pumped while the cows are drinking. Too warm water is insiped and distasteful and the cows will not drink enough of it. They should be given all they will drink at least twice a day. This will give highest milk production.

6. The sixth large factor in high milk production is to treat the cows kindly. They should never be worried by dogs or other live stock. Swearing and loud talking or other boisterous conduct around the dairy barn is never permitted on our best dairy farms. These things among the cows make them nervous and excitable and cause a loss in milk production.

It has been often pointed out that milk production is a "mother instinct;" hence anything that is harmful to a mother or which annoys her or makes her nervous will surely affect the flow of milk. We should never lose sight of this fact in all our feeding, care and management of dairy cattle.

To Keep the Silo from Freezing

Keep the doors closed as much as possible. Silage is continually giving off heat. This heat is caused by the fermentation of the silage and is known as the "heat of fermentation." It is important to keep this heat of fermentation in the silo. This heat is usually sufficient to prevent freezing of the silage except in the coldest weather. Silage is warmest in the center of the silo since the air surrounding the walls on the outside conducts off the heat. This sometimes causes the silage to freeze to the walls. The remedy is to keep the silage fed down around the outside walls. Always have the silage highest in the center when feeding, if possible. Should it freeze to the walls during a long cold spell, it will loosen readily when the weather moderates. The chunks of frozen silage that are thus loosened from the wall should be piled up in the center of the silo where the heat of fermentation will soon thaw them. Under no circumstances should frozen silage be fed to stock, or any other frozen food, for that matter.

Saving the Heifer Calves

We read in the papers the other day of a novel institution started in a certain agricultural community and to be managed, maintained and operated by country school children. It is a calf raising plant and for the saving and rearing of the heifer calves, of dairy cows, which at present are being sold for veal or even killed rather than give them the needed milk to drink.

Now there is not the slightest doubt that thousands of good calves are marketed each year that might have proved a wonderful help to many a starting farmer or settler and which indeed would have proved profitable to the breeder himself; but it as true that other thousands of young calves are not worth raising and we trust that the children will not be allowed to waste their time and feed on such worthless "critters."

It is a fact that many dairy farmers buy springers just as soon as the cows they own dry up and are sold as canners or fattened off, and never raise a heifer calf to the cow estate. As many more, perhaps, use "any old kind of bull" merely to bring the cows into the milking state, the calves counting for nothing and never being raised. It will be poor business for the children or for anyone to buy and raise such heifer calves.

We have come to the conclusion, from long experience and observation, that there is only one sort of heifer calf worth raising and that is the one that on both sire and dam side has a promise for milk and butter fat. The dam and grand dam on both sides should have been a profitable milk and butter fat producer. If not the calf should not be raised. Feed and labor are terribly high and the profit from dairying comparatively small under the best of conditions and circumstances and for that reason more care than ever should be taken to raise only the most promising calves.

If any reader of COMFORT is trying to get a start let him not waste time in trying to grade up from scrub cows and a grade or scrub bull. Far better would it be for him to start with one or two high grade cows, if he can find such, and even if they cost $100 or $125 dollars a head, than to start with a bunch of scrub cows. For mating with these cows should be kept a pure bred dairy breed bull of the same breed as that used for the grading up of the cows and the heifer calves from these animals should be raised just as well as can possibly be done that they may make a maximum growth and development from the start. In addition to this small breeding operation the dairyman should be constantly on the watch to buy the heifer calf of any neighboring cow that he knows to be a big producer. He may have to pay up to $20 each for such calves but there is profit even at that figure. Figuring that it costs as high as $35 to raise such a heifer it is a certainty that $50

Pigeons for Profit

PROBABLY pigeons are the most neglected—or rather the most mismanaged—of all poultry on the general farm, yet they are most profitable if well cared for, and especially appropriate for the man who has to be away at work most of the day, or the woman with heavy household duties to occupy most of her time, because they won't overeat; food can be left before them all the time, and the parent birds take all the care of the young ones, so that an hour in the morning is about all that anyone need devote to pigeons every day in the week, with a few extra hours on Saturday to clean up.

There is really money in the business, if you are prepared to earn it. The people must understand that raising pigeons is a business requiring industry and management to make it a success. Unfortunately, a lot of nonsense has been written about pigeons and squab-raising. Lots of people have run away with the idea that all they have to do is to buy a few birds, throw in a little corn night and morning, and make a fortune. True, there is no heavy work to be done, and a good income can be made on a fair-sized flock of homers which are given intelligent care. For our selection must be homers, because they are the best variety for squab-raising, and squabs are what we must depend on for steady market returns.

Squabs from common mixed pigeons only weigh some six ounces when about four weeks old, are dark skinned, scrawny, and difficult to market; but homer squabs weigh from twelve to twenty ounces when four weeks of age; are plump, attractive in appearance, and sell readily at four dollars a dozen in the wholesale market. Private customers will readily give forty cents a pair all through the winter. Every pair of good birds, well cared for, produce from ten to twelve squabs a year, which are ready to market when four weeks old; so they have not to be fed for long, and returns are quickly realized.

Mature homers will cost about two dollars a pair from any of the recognized lofts, but it is no use buying elsewhere, for unless birds are mated pairs you may have another season wasted. Pigeons are faithful creatures which may remain in pairs for years, and if an accident happens to one of them it will frequently refuse to mate a second time the same season. Young birds which are only paired at the time of sale are likely to object to the mates which have been chosen for them, and proceed to exercise personal choice when liberated among a flock of strange birds. So be wise, and buy only from reliable, experienced breeders.

A comfortable house is essential, and the best plan for a small flock is to build a regular chicken-house and cover it all over with tar paper or any one of the good roofing papers. The yard must be enclosed, of course, and should extend over the roof, and five or six feet above it, so the birds can alight on it when flying from end to end, and sun themselves (which they love to do) on a high, dry place. Put up two or three long perches at the end of the yard; a stand about three feet high in the center for a bath tub. Let the stand be a foot larger all round than the bath, so the birds can light on it. The size of the house must depend, of course, on the quantity of birds you intend to keep. Just remember that each pair of old pigeons must have two nest boxes eleven inches square, with an earthenware pan in each. Nest boxes can cover the wall from floor to ceiling, so after it is fitted, it is easy to tell just how many birds a house can accommodate. The earthenware pans are called nappies, and are manufactured on purpose for pigeons. They can be bought at any supply store for five or ten cents each. There is a brown crockery dish about seven inches across and two deep, which is to be found in most five and ten cent stores, that answers very well if you can't get the real things in your immediate vicinity.

Now about feeding. Just throwing down cracked corn won't do. Variety in diet is necessary for birds' health as well as for man and beasts. It is wise to give the food question a little thought. Kafir corn, red wheat, cracked corn, Canadian field peas, German millet, and hemp are all staple grains. Use whichever can be had cheapest in your vicinity, and alternate them whenever you can. We follow the rule recommendel by W. E. Rice, a very successful pigeon raiser: Morning: Equal parts of cracked corn, Kafir corn, and wheat. Evening: Cracked corn and Canadian peas. These regular meals are put into feed boxes in quantity sufficient to insure the birds having a constant supply. Treats, which we feed at odd times, such as millet, hemp and rice, are thrown on the ground; for, as they are only fed in comparatively small quantities, they are eaten up at once, and so there is no danger of their being soiled. Remember always to buy red, not white, wheat, for the latter is very apt to cause diarrhea.

Regular feeds are always placed in a self-feeder, so that the birds may help themselves. Peas, millet, hemp and rice are good only as treats once or twice a week. They are fed in small quantities, and alone, because we found out that if mixed with other grains, the birds would pick out the dainties and throw out the grain or wheat.

Unless starved to it, pigeons will not eat grain that has been defiled by lying on the floor, so to prevent waste it is best to have a self-feeder, or at least some contrivance which prevents birds getting their head or feet into the supply and scattering it. The treats we feed by hand, and scatter on the floor, but if the birds are naturally eager for a novelty, it is picked up at once. Remember that white wheat is very likely to produce diarrhea, so always order red, and don't be tempted to use new grain of any sort, or corn exclusively, for if you do, your birds will surely be troubled with canker. During the year, and especially in the early winter, I always receive letters asking why pigeons are afflicted with a strange disease of the throat and mouth, which looks like a cheesy growth; and it is for that reason that I caution you against the exclusive corn diet, for that is what caused the trouble, and often spoils the whole breeding season.

Once a week we give them a meal of stale bread which has been steeped in skim-milk and squeezed almost dry again, for we have lots of skim-milk, and the bread we get from a baker in town for twenty-five cents a barrel. Freight costs another twenty-five cents, but even at fifty cents a barrel we find it an economical feed when there are a lot of squabs to be fattened for the market.

The Parents Take Care of the Young

The parent birds take all the trouble and responsibility of feeding and raising the young right up to the time when they are ready for market. The hen bird lays two eggs with one day intervening which takes eighteen days to incubate. After the eggs are hatched, both birds devote their entire energies to feeding the youngsters for about two weeks, for both have the power to secrete the predigested substance often called pigeons' milk, on which nestlings are exclusively fed for the first few days. At the end of two weeks the hen has usually laid two more eggs in the second nest, so that by the time her squabs in the first nest are ready for the market, the second eggs are ready to hatch. It is this double family which necessitates two nests for each pair of birds.

Cleanliness is even more imperative in the pigeon-house than in the henhouse. Never neglect to scald out the earthenware nest, and whitewash the compartment it stands in, every time squabs are removed for market, for it is only by such rigid system that the place can be kept in sanitary condition. Pigeons must have shell, salt and charcoal to be healthy, so there should be a self feeder with three compartments in each house. When ordering, specify that the oyster shell is for pigeons, as it is to be broken up smaller than for the hens. The rock salt and charcoal should be ground to about the size of rice. During the heavy breeding season we crush most of the grain, and always peas, for when the parents are rushed for time between their nests they are very liable to pick up whole grain and feed it to their young birds before they are able to digest it. Until we discovered this carelessness, we very often found dead squabs in the nest. The feed boxes can be kept filled up, as pigeons never overeat, and must have access to food at all times when they have young ones to feed.

Increasing the Flock

If you start with a few pairs of birds, the best way to increase the number is to sell the squabs and use the money to buy mature birds, for it takes six months for pigeons to reach maturity, and it is necessary to have two extra houses in which to keep the growing birds, as they should not be allowed to remain in the regular brood pen. If, however, you have specially mated birds and desire to raise their progeny, you must watch the nests, and as soon as the young ones get out on the floor (the old ones generally push them out as soon as the eggs in the second nest hatch), they can fend for themselves, and should be removed to a nursery house, where all feed must be cracked to the size of rice for several weeks.

When the young ones in the nurseries are between six and seven months old we take a bird from each and put them into a mating cage, which is really a coop, four feet long, two and one half feet deep, and two feet high, which is fastened up in a corner of the feedhouse. The coop is divided into two compartments by a wire netting door. A bird is put into each compartment. If they are male and female, they will commence within a week or two to coo and talk to each other through the wire, at which time the compartment is fastened up to the top of the cage, and they are allowed to have the run of the coop for three or four days, after which they are put into a regular breeding house, where they will soon take possession of a nest. If, however, the birds chosen simply ignore each other after they are put into the mating cage, one of them is removed to another two-compartment cage, and two more birds are taken from the nursery house and put into the two compartments. In this way we go through the nests until we have them all paired.

L. G.—Rations composed entirely of corn and table scraps are too concentrated and fattening for ducks. They may lay well and appear to thrive on such food for a time, but before long the bad effect is sure to show. They will probably lose the use of their legs, or die suddenly. Better change your method of feeding at once. At least one half their food should be vegetable. Cook small potatoes, turnips, carrots, or any cull vegetables, partly mash them, and to every two quarts add one pint of ground corn and oats or middlings, and the same quantity of wheat bran. If you have no vegetables to spare, chop up clover or Alfalfa hay, pour scalding water over it, cover tightly, let it steam for several hours, then mix in the grain. After the grass springs up in the early spring, feed just a little bran and middlings made into a mash. Keep grit and clean water before them all the time. The troubles you have experienced at hatching time have come principally from your mistake in feeding the breeding stock. When ducks, or any kind of poultry, are fed exclusively on fattening food, their eggs never hatch well, and what youngsters do manage to kick out are always weak and short lived. Another cause for the condition you describe is want of moisture. Ducks' eggs require much more moisture during incubation than hens' eggs. If an incubator is used, keep pans of moist sand or wet sponges at the bottom of the machine all through the hatch, and when hens or ducks are doing the incubating, make them nests on the ground, and if the weather is very dry, sprinkle the eggs with warm water every few days.

P. K.—Commercial beef or meat scraps, sold specially for poultry, are dry, and so keep almost indefinitely if they are kept in a dry, cool place, but if allowed to get moist or warm, they will spoil rapidly. Ground green bone will only keep about a week, and must be spread out thinly to avoid heating. Commercial meat meal or scraps of some kind can usually be bought at every large feed store. You will find information about running an incubator in the next issue of COMFORT. None of the personal experiences received contain enough original or helpful information to make them valuable.

B. P.—The description of the home-made, non-freezing water fountain was given last month.

O. D. K.—As corn is scarce and expensive in your vicinity, use wheat, and during very cold weather add one half pint of buckwheat, barley, or sunflower seed to each quart. If none of these are available, use wheat alone, and give plenty of milk to drink.

J. E. M. N.—Staggers, dizziness, and kindred symptoms, all suggest apoplexy or paralysis, caused by blood pressure on the brain, which affects the nervous system. Excessive fat, overeating of new grain, intestinal worms, stoppage in the egg passage, or, in the case of old, fat hens, being made to rush around in an unaccustomed way, are all causes for such a condition. The best treatment is to open one of the veins inside the wing and allow about two teaspoonfuls of blood to escape. Keep the bird quiet for a few days, and feed lightly. Give five grains of potassium twice a day for about a week. Birds which have shown any such symptoms should never be used in the breeding pen.

J. D.—I cannot print your request and address in these columns, but if I hear from any of our readers who have turkeys for sale, I will forward their letters to you. Meantime, I advise you to write to Mr. E. F. Pullins, secretary of the National Bronze Turkey Club, Rennselaer, Indiana, and to Miss Minnie B. Brown, secretary of the Bourbon Red Turkey Club, Appleton City, Missouri, asking them for the addresses of members in your vicinity.

M. M. W. B.—The hens have got cold. Look for cracks or other causes for drafts in the chicken-houses. Put a teaspoonful of kerosene oil in the drinking water for a week.

E. S.—The yellow spots in the mouth and the offensive breath, are unmistakable symptoms of roup. The spots in the mouth or throat might be a cankerous cold only, and the sores on the comb and wattles merely retarded circulation. But the bad odor with breath is an unmistakable sign of roup, which is a most contagious disease, and may affect the whole flock, unless great care is taken to prevent the contagion spreading. As this is the time of the year when colds and roup are prevalent, I am going to repeat some of the advice I have given in this column before, as prevention is much easier than cure when things are taken in time. I want you to understand that every ordinary cold may develop into roup if not checked at once. I beg of you to watch your fowls at the first sign of watery eyes, sneezing, coughing or heavy breathing, to remove the afflicted birds to a clean coop in some sheltered outhouse far removed from the other poultry, and keep them in strict quarantine while doctoring. As all forms of cold may be roup, treat them for that disease without waiting to diagnose the case. Spray the bird's nostrils, eyes, mouth and throat three times a day with a strong solution of permanganate of potassium, dioxogen or peroxide. For the first, dilute one teaspoonful of permanganate of potassium in a quart of water, and for use, dilute one teaspoonful of that mixture with three of water. If dioxogen or peroxide is used, one half teaspoonful to every half cup of water. If you have no atomizer or syringe, strip a wing feather to within an inch of the tip, dip it into the solution, and swab out the bird's throat and mouth, and bathe the nostrils and eyes with a clean, soft cloth saturated with the lotion. Cover the bottom of the coop with plenty of clean, chopped hay. Clean out every day. Feed on light nourishing food. Stale bread steeped in milk and squeezed dry, or a little breakfast oatmeal. If colds have developed into roup before the birds have been removed from the regular chicken-house, all the feed and water dishes must be scalded and disinfected. The house also must be cleaned and disinfected if weather will permit, and every precaution taken to kill the contagion before it becomes epidemic.

B. G. T.—The hens have what is called limberneck, which is usually caused by the birds eating mouldy grain or putrid meat. If any more should be affected in the same way, give a teaspoonful of Castor oil to thoroughly clean out the intestines and stop the irritation, and follow a few hours later with the same quantity of sweet oil.

E. H.—Please read answer to J. D. in this issue.

C. W. W.—A three-year-old rooster, if a strong, healthy bird, should be in his prime, and certainly cannot be the cause of so many blind chickens. You don't say if they are incubator or hen hatched. If the former, irregularities in the heat of the machine

The Doings of The Dapperlings

By Lena B. Ellingwood

EXPLANATORY.—This story tells the strange things that happen to five-year-old Simmie-Sammie Smith and his sister Pittysing, nearly two years older, through the sly pranks of Nattie, the "Smallest Dapperling of All." The Dapperlings are kind-hearted, gay little elflike beings who ride on rabbits and never let themselves be seen by human eyes because of their belief that, if seen, it would bring some terrible calamity upon them. For this reason their queer little houses are always built into the hillside, and are so made, with doors and windows in front and grass growing on the backs, that they can be turned around to face out when the Dapperlings are by themselves; but as soon as anybody comes in sight the houses are whirled around so that only the grass-covered backs are seen and, as these look like the rest of the hill, you would never know the houses were there. They also have an underground assembly hall with an opening in the top covered with moss and concealed in a clump of thistles.

NATTIE CARRIED IT HOME SO ALL THE DAPPERLINGS COULD SEE AND ADMIRE IT.

CHAPTER V.

A BASKET OF FLOWERS

NATTIE didn't like Sarah-Grace-Josephine. Sarah-Grace-Josephine, you remember, was Pittysing's big doll.

Not that she had ever done anything unkind to Nattie—dolls can't DO anything—but you see, it was this way. Nattie loved Pittysing. She loved her kindness to her little brother. She loved her bright brisk ways. She loved her brown eyes, and her thick brown hair, and her pink cheeks. She wanted to play with her, and talk with her—but she couldn't! And when she had to hide, and watch that Sarah-Grace-Josephine, made of pulp and sawdust, or some unbreakable, senseless stuff, with painted face and glued-on hair—I say, when she had to watch Sarah-Grace-Josephine being petted, and hugged, and kissed, and played with, it was almost more than she could bear.

She grew a little reckless, and almost wished that Pittysing would see her some day, quite by accident. She wondered what would really happen then. She asked Lulie Wye about it one day, but Lulie Wye looked horrified and said, "Mercy, child! Don't ask me! I don't know, but don't you ever dare to try it!"

Then Nattie went out to where Niddy-Nod Dapperling was trying to balance three sticks on the end of another stick, and asked him.

He was so surprised he dropped all four sticks on the ground. He looked at her very solemnly for two whole minutes before he stooped to pick up the sticks. Then he said:

"Once upon a time, long, long ago, so long that nobody remembers it now, there was a young and foolish Dapperling who wanted to play with a little boy. He was told not to do it, and was told what would happen if he did. But he didn't believe it. So—" Niddy-Nod looked fearfully around, and then whispered, "So, one day, he said good by to all his friends, and went and played with the boy."

"Oh, really?" cried Nattie breathlessly. And what DID happen to him?"

"How do you expect ME to know?" asked Niddy-Nod crossly. "Haven't I told you nobody remembers?" Then he went on balancing his sticks, and would say no more.

Nattie spent most of her time, now, near the Mill Brook. One day when she was sent for checkerberries, of which the Dapperlings are very fond, she found a beautiful little vine, with tiny leaves and waxy white berries. Carrying it carefully, she laid it on the children's barrel-top table, as an offering to Pittysing. Then, after she had taken the checkerberries home, she went back to the Mill Brook. But, though she watched most of the day, Pittysing did not come.

The next day it was the same. Simmie-Sammie, alone, splashed about in the brook a while, but didn't seem to enjoy it, and soon went home.

When the third day passed and Pittysing had not been near, the Smallest Dapperling of All grew worried, and determined on a bold step.

In the early morning, before anyone was about, she went to the house where the children lived, and hid in the big rose bush that grew close beside the doorstep. And there she stayed.

She heard someone say that Pittysing was sick. Nattie didn't know what that might mean, for Dapperlings are never sick.

Pittysing was in bed.

She didn't play with Simmie-Sammie.

She had to drink things she didn't like.

And the red had gone out of her cheeks.

So much Nattie learned by peeping through doors and windows, and listening. She wondered what she could do to please Pittysing, and decided she would give her some flowers. Not any common flowers, mind you, that grew around where anyone could find them, but a kind that Pittysing had never seen.

There was a little flower that only the Dapperlings knew about, and which they called the Dapperose. It grew in the woods, under a certain kind of yellow-capped moss, and only then when gold-thread grew among the moss. So you see even the Dapperlings couldn't find it very often.

But Niddy-Nod said he had found such a place, and thought some of the flowers might be growing there, though he hadn't looked. Nattie coaxed him to show her the place. It was up near where he was building a little house for his rabbit to stay in when the weather was cold, and he said she might come along if she liked.

Nattie took a little basket to carry the flowers in if she found them, a graceful, dainty basket, woven by the skillful fingers of Lulie Wye, from the dark, slender stems of maiden-hair ferns. "When you give, give of your best. A gift that costs no sacrifice is of little worth," was a Dapperling motto. It had taken Nattie hours to find enough of the stems, and Lulie Wye, when she had finished the basket, pronounced it quite the prettiest she had ever made.

When Nattie and Niddy-Nod reached the place where the yellow-capped moss and gold-thread were growing, Nattie knelt down, and with careful little fingers pulled away the roots. There, in a warm little hollow, safe and sheltered, was the Dapperose, all in bloom.

"Oh, oh," she cried; "how beautiful!"

Even Niddy-Nod was interested, and looked while she gently lifted the Dapperose, with its pale green, transparent leaves and tiny pink and white flowers, from its little bed. In the Dapperling basket, it was almost too dainty and pretty to be anything but a fairy flower.

Nattie carried it home, so all the Dapperlings could see and admire it, and then started for Pittysing's house.

She looked sharply about her, and had to hide several times on the way, but at last crawled under the big rose bush by the doorstep without having been seen by anybody. Maybe she couldn't ever get into the house, and into Pittysing's room, but she was going to try.

Hours passed, she grew tired and hungry, and the sun went down.

Then Simmie-Sammie, starting tor Grandma Brown's house with a bright tin can full of milk, which the children carried over there every night, left the door open. Only a little way, but Nattie slipped inside.

Wasn't she afraid? Oh, yes, indeed! For she didn't know where the folks were, or what minute they would see her. And Cattie Puss, with her great, green eyes, might be there, too.

She ran across the kitchen, not making a bit of noise, and peeped around the sitting-room door. No one was there, but she heard voices in the next room, which was Pittysing's.

Chippie Chatter was there, in the old bird cage, and began scolding at her, but Chippie Chatter often scolded, so nobody minded.

The Smallest Dapperling of all lifted the couch cover, and hid under the couch. She sat down on the floor, with her basket of flowers in her lap, to wait some more.

Simmie-Sammie, on the way home from Grandma Brown's, fell on a rock and cried so loud the little spotted toad who lived on Lone Cedar Knoll heard him plainly.

His father and mother ran out to see if he was killed, though they might have known better by the noise he made, and that was Nattie's chance.

She looked in through the bedroom door. Pittysing's eyes were closed.

Nattie tiptoed carefully across the room, set the flower basket on a low stool by the bed, and was tiptoeing out again. Just as she was passing around the door, Pittysing's brown eyes opened wide.

The Smallest Dapperling of All hid under the couch again.

"Mamma!" called Pittysing. "Mamma! Come here, this minute!"

Then her father and mother, leaving their son still crying, hurried into the house to see to their daughter.

"Where'd that little girl go to?" asked Pittysing wildly.

"There, there; hush, dear!" soothed her mother. "There wasn't any little girl here."

"Oh, yes, there was," said Pittysing. "A little, teeny, mite o' girl, not so big as Sarah-Grace-Josephine. I saw her."

"Maybe you dreamed it. Lie down, dear, and mamma'll smooth your head. Papa, you better go and tell the doctor to come up again this evening."

"Why, see here!" said her father. What's this?" And he awkwardly lifted the tiny Dapperling basket of flowers in his big hands.

"Give 'em here!" cried Pittysing. "They're mine! The sweet, lovely things! I just about know they're fairy flowers. Just tell me where they came from, will you, if there wasn't any little girl? I'm not dreaming flowers, am I?"

And her mother and father just stared at each other, and didn't have a word to say.

Simmie-Sammie came in then, and in all the confusion, the Smallest Dapperling of All crept softly out of the house, ran home, and climbed into her own llttle bed.

Don't miss next month's Dapperling story which tells how Nattie did Pittysing a good turn.

The Cost of Opera

"New York city is the only place in this country big enough and rich enough to have opera as a steady diet all winter," said a man with a musical cast of countenance, "and no wonder when we come to think of what it costs to run a music show like the opera is. Other cities in the world have opera regularly, but the government pays part of the expenses. The Paris opera, for instance, pulls $160,000 a year from the national coffers; Berlin, $225,000; Dresden, $120,000, Prague,, $100,000, Vienna, $120,000, and so on in smaller amounts in smaller cities, but New York's opera is paid for out of private pockets and the sum is a big one. New York has two opera houses, the Metropolitan and the Manhattan, this latter for only a couple of years, while the former has been in operation for many years and is the leading opera house in America. One week of its expenses are about as follows: new scenery, $10,000; orchestra, $6,500; chorus, $4,000; traveling expenses and advertising, $5,500; singing, about $40,000, Caruso getting about $6,000 of this, and four sopranos about $7,000. The total is about $80,000 a week, or say $13,000 a day. Caruso the great tenor, is said to receive $2,000 every time he sings; sopranos are paid from $750 to $1,000 for each performance and contraltos from $500 to $800; baritones and basses get from $600 to $1,000. The Metropolitan Opera House has a seating capacity of about 60,000 a week and outside performances in other cities, make up some additional returns, but it is of record that a big deficit has been shown at the close of a number of seasons, and the stockholders, if they were not millionaires and wanted the opera as a fashionable advertisement and a great place to show off their elegant jewelry and glad rags, would call for a settlement and go out of the business. But they have the money and they are willing to spend it for the sake of making their city one of the leading opera centers of the world."

$2,500 FOR 8-INCH LOT.—The Charles F. Noyes Co. of New York sold to another firm a strip of land eight inches wide adjoining 49 Walker St. for $2,500. The strip perfects title to the building, which may be a reason for the great cost of the small strip of land.

Toughey's Travels and Adventures Abroad

By Adele Steiner Burleson

Mrs. Burleson, through her frequent and charming contributions to COMFORT, has won the hearts of our readers and they will hail with delight the appearance of this new series of "Toughey" stories from the pen of this talented and versatile writer.

It is the more interesting because it is a true story of the experiences of the author and the adventures of her children about twelve years ago, although in the narrative she modestly conceals her identity by calling her husband and herself Mr. and Mrs. Deering.

"Toughey" is the pet name of their eldest daughter Laura, a prim little miss just budding into young womanhood. The childish pranks of Nan and Bess, the two younger girls usually spoken of as "the children," are a source of worriment and some annoyance to the sedate Toughey who is several years their senior.

Mr. Burleson is our present Postmaster General, and Grandma is the author's mother.—EDITOR.

CHAPTER XI.

ADVENTURES IN CANADA.

A WIDE sweep of lawn, velvety green with the fullness of summer, extended from the shade of the giant, century-old willows to the edge of the fruit fields. Across its smooth surface, ranged bright-eyed robins, industriously seeking earthworms.

"I can't understand the temperament of a robin."

"What's the mystery?"

"How can it love worms and yet have an insatiable taste for cherries?"

"Don't you like peaches and didn't I hear you growling at dinner because you were not served with dead calf?"

"Don't!"

Toughey was startled and routed.

"Is that what you've been taught to call respectable roast veal?"

"I did not learn it in a college course," admitted Roger.

"I suppose that will come when you are a senior," teased Toughey.

"I'm already a senior, my lady."

"That is, you ceased to be a junior last month."

"Define me then please; no longer a junior, not yet a senior, what am I?"

"We'll classify you after our swim," said Toughey laugning, "we're late now," she added glancing at the little wrist watch, Roger Hewett's father had sent her the Christmas before.

"Where are the children?"

"Just where they should be, of course, doing some unexpected, but wholly righteous thing," replied the young fellow rising from the garden seat and gazing about for the missing children.

"They always disappear at the bathing hour, but they feel terribly mistreated if we went without them," explained Toughey.

"Where are they likely to be?"

"Heaven knows; we'll have to look for them."

They went to the barn where the fruit pickers gathered at this hour with the morning's harvest of raspberries, this year so plentiful as to require the work of all hands on the farm to save a large portion from rotting on the bushes. Here they found Indians of all ages waiting for their baskets to be weighed, checked off and loaded on the farm dray.

"The fruit is shipped to Toronto by the noon train and when there is room, the children drive down to the station," explained Toughey.

"Gee! I shouldn't mind spending the summer on a fruit farm, myself," said Roger gazing at the tempting display of beautiful cherries.

"We like it," said Toughey, "but where, where are those brats?"

"They may be picking berries," suggested Roger.

"Impossible! They picked yesterday and their industry never lasts two days together."

Nevertheless, they made a hurried search of the berry bushes, the cherry trees and the peach orchard and headed back to their starting place. Rounding the brick cottage where the Deerings were housed for the summer, they discovered the children, clad in bathing suits and caps seated on the steps looking like a pair of small, patient angels.

The young people looked at each other and laughed.

"Aren't they the limit! we've been looking creation over for you," declared Toughey.

"You thed 'leven 'clock," lisped Bess with the air of an injured cherub.

"Deed you did," supplemented Nan. "You said, 'Children the lake at eleven o'clock.'"

"But who'd have thought," began Toughey, "Oh, well let's hurry and get ready."

A few minutes later the entire party including Mrs. Deering and Grandmother filed down to the lake which was only a hundred yards behind the house. A fallen tree on the beach dry and gray from long death, washed there by the heavy waves of Lake Ontario during a storm period afforded a comfortable seat for Grandmother who feared the shock of the cold water.

"I didn't know you kept a tropical sun up here in Canada," remarked Roger assisting Grandmother to the willow-shaded end of the log.

"You'll need it before you get done with this water," warned Toughey slipping from the little dock into the melted ice of the big lake. He joined her and after a vigorous swim, declared that no polar bear could like it better than he did.

Both the getting in and out of the water was a long and intricate process for the little girls, accompanied by many shrieks and false starts but ending with the cold dip and then the inevitable argument against coming out. The bathing ended, there was a race up hill and up into the cherry trees where the fruit was beginning to ripen. Grandmother and Mrs. Deering stood underneath humbly eating the cherries that were tossed down to them. But the gong for the early dinner in the big house of their hosts shortened this foraging.

Over a hundred years before the bricks of which it was built had been brought from England. The ground where it stood and the surrounding farm had been part of a land grant to an immigrant American whose loyalty to the King kept him from joining the Revolutionary movement then in progress. Although the fine old house was still possessed by descendants of the original owners, the once princely domain had dwindled to comparatively few acres, out of which scientific knowledge and unremitting labor combined to extract only a respectable living.

Immediately behind the house, on the brow of the hill rising from the lake were shacks erected for the use of the fruit pickers during the season.

"Yes, they depend entirely upon Indian labor and they make an interesting colony," said Mrs. Deering to Roger Hewitt, as they walked to the village that afternoon, where Roger was to take the train back to the states. Toughey was leading the way with the children ranging disconnectedly along the narrow asphalt walk and its grassy borders. Behind came a stout Indian with Roger's bags and suit case.

"I must get a view of this boy," said Roger unslinging his kodak.

"He may not submit to it," Mrs. Deering warned, "the old ones think there is witchcraft in a kodak."

Roger laughed and drew some money from his pocket. "Perhaps an Indian is like a gypsy, you must cross his palm with silver," and he held out a shining quarter to the boy. The young Indian hesitated a moment between the prideful teachings of his race and the lure of the paleface. Then he grinned and as the little shutter clicked, he slipped the money in his pocket.

"I wish I could stay longer, but I've only time to make my engagements in St. Louis," Roger spoke to Mrs. Deering but he looked at Toughey.

It was almost a year since he had said good by to her in Brighton.

She seemed more womanly and had the delightful dignity of sixteen. His father had always called her a rose.

"A wild rose, father," modified Roger, laughing.

The village was small and the express stopped only a few seconds. The good byes were over in a flash and a moment later, the train was swallowed up in a curve and Roger was gone.

"Leth go to the poth-offith," suggeseted Bess, who had recently acquired a lisp from a small playmate in Washington.

"Say that again," said Toughey severely, "and don't lisp." To her, this readiness to acquire the peculiarities of one's associates evidenced a total lack of character and today she felt unaccountably irritated by the child's speech.

Bess looked indignant but said nothing.

"Let's go to the post-office," seconded Nan.

"What for," asked Toughey, still irritably and starting back toward the farm. There were no letters for her, she knew.

"Letters from papa," exclaimed the children, indignantly. Toughey flushed, her mother smiled.

"We heard from your father this morning, there will be nothing from him."

As they walked back, Toughey kept her head turned until her color was normal and she could think of something to say that was a thousand miles away from her thoughts.

Reaching the flower walks leading to the mansion, they passed two of the girls employed upon the place, one had the heavy brows and dark coloring of the Indian race—the other was a pure blonde.

Grandmother looked at her curiously.

"They say she's an Indian," Mrs. Deering remarked answering her mother's unspoken question.

"Ah," breathed Grandmother, "she never came out of an Indian lodge."

A few days later, following a proconceived plan, Mrs. Deering engaged the blonde girl to follow up Nan and Bess in their various excursions about the place.

"Poor girl! What are her crimes that she should be so punished? And so young, too!"

The children glanced suspiciously at Toughey as she spoke.

"They are going to be polite and kind to Norma, and she will be good to them," said Mrs. Deering quickly.

The little girls looked at Toughey mildly triumphant, the dawn of righteousness shining on their little faces, as though their record had already been made and approved.

"Remember Mabel in England!" continued Toughey. "Once she was a happy little girl too, until she met some particular little American villians and——" with small snorts Nan and Bess jumped upon her.

"Don't, Toughey, you're discouraging them," said Mrs. Deering coming to the children's rescue.

"All right, time will show," Toughey persisted, laughing and defending herself against the children's indignant attack.

At the beginning of their association with Norma, Nan and Bess were so gentle and obedient that Toughey and Grandmother had many a secret laugh at their attitude. This plan gave Toughey more freedom for her necessary reading for college in the autumn and also more chance to join in the tennis parties and dances and other frolics with the young people of the house.

"We want to go to the 'vival," said Nan one morning. Mrs. Deering looked puzzled.

"She means the revival meeting at the Park," explained Toughey "Let them go mamma; Mr. Brooke has offered to take us on the farm dray and it's only a little way."

Mrs. Deering hesitated. She did not favor excursions of any kind for the children.

"Norma wants to go and we'll be back for supper," Toughey urged. Mrs. Deering finally consented with the understanding that it was to be the children's only outing.

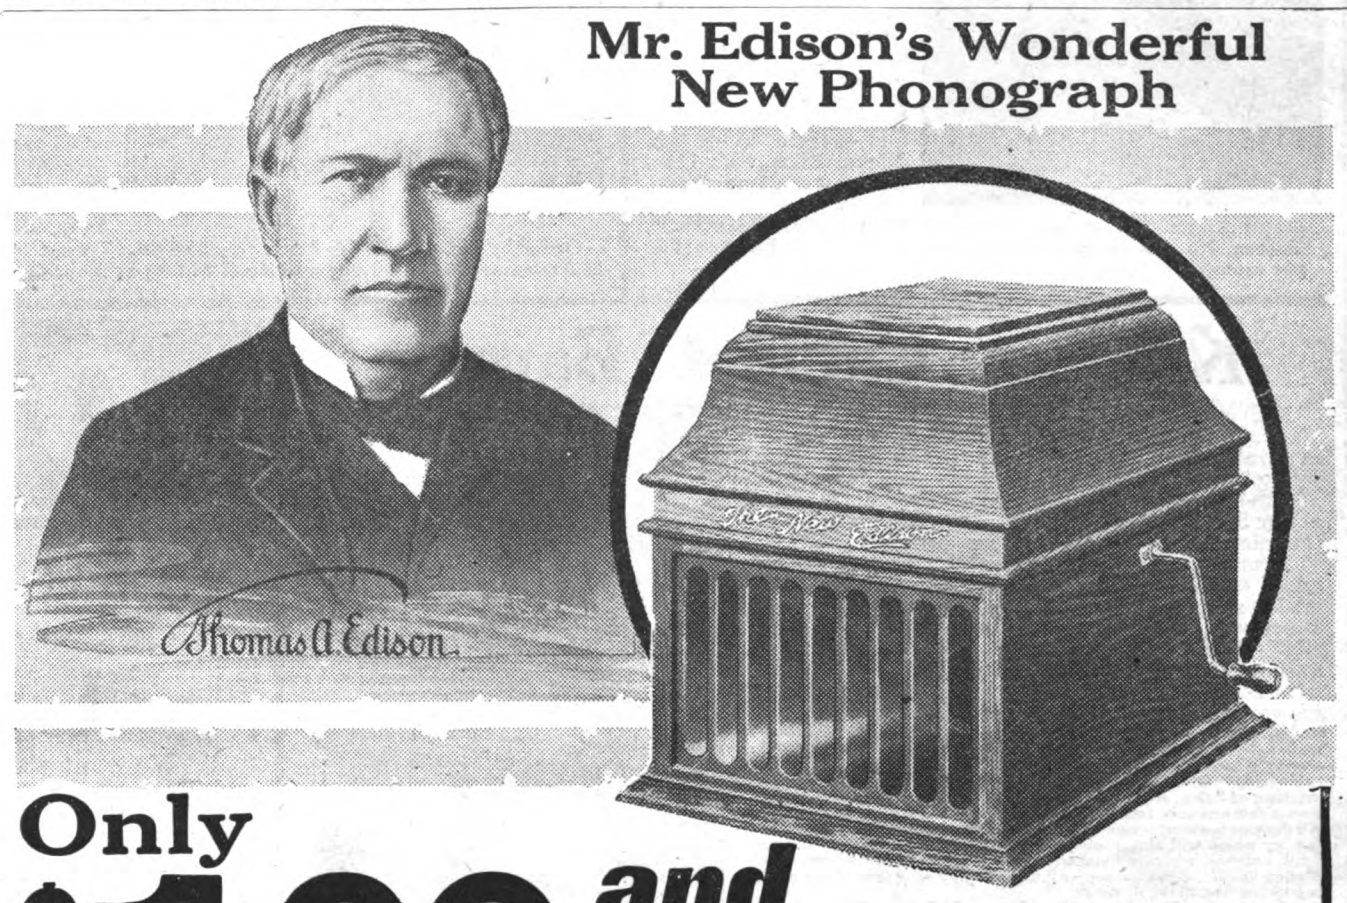
The little party consisting of the younger members of the household with Mr. Brooke, their host, reached the lakeside resort early and at once sought seats in the pavilion where a famous revivalist had been engaged to hold services.

After half an hour of yawns, the children, with Norma and her little Indian sister of three years, who was only permitted to come at the children's urging, slipped away to the high bluff skirting the lake and down the steep path to the beach, to the smooth white sand in which they so loved to dig. Norma had brought along the same buckets and shovels they had used in Brighton, England, the summer previous. While they were gleefully burying the Indian child, thoughtfully pausing at the neck, Norma heard a whistle and glancing upward, she saw the Indian, "Rainy Day," commonly called John, beckoning to her, from the edge of the cliff. He wanted to talk with her. Seeing the children still busy in the sand, she reluctantly yielded to his entreaty and began the ascent of the steep path, where he met her half way.

The interment on the beach proceeded gaily until the child discovering herself to be too firmly rooted to even wiggle, began to whimper. A speedy disinterment followed but not quickly enough to appease the child. Anxious to pacify her themselves the children began to run with her, but she would not be comforted.

Arriving at the pier, they discovered a row boat drawn up on the beach so that only half of it remained in the water.

"Leth put her in the boat."



Nan looked doubtful until she noticed that the boat was tied to the dock. Then she agreed.

"Go to sleep," commanded Nan, "and you'll wake up in the moon." Making a pillow of their coats which Norma had placed on the boat, Nan coaxed the little creature to lie down and close her eyes. Rocking the boat gently she sang a cradle song.

"You theep too," said the child, opening her eyes. The children crouched down, half closed their eyes and continued their lullaby. Presently Nan ceased. "She's gone to sleep," she whispered. Bess leaned over. "Don't move yet, you'll wake her," cautioned Nan and they kept still for a

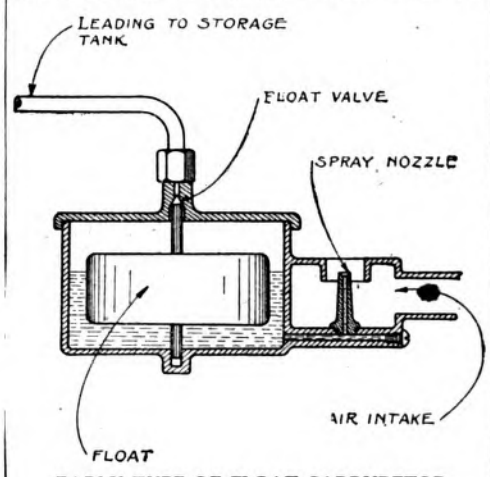
Automobile and Gas Engine Helps



Questions relating to gasoline engines and automobiles, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Auto Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department. Full name and address is required, but initials only will be printed.

The Carburetor

THE carburetor might rightfully be termed the lungs of the engine as upon its proper performance depend the power, service and efficient action. It is that instrument which brings gasoline and air together and causes to be formed a vapor of the proper proportions to be highly explosive. In other words the operating principle of the automobile engine is based upon the fact that a fine spray of gasoline mixed with air in the correct proportion forms a highly inflammable gas or mixture of air and gasoline vapor, which when compressed in a small air-tight chamber and ignited by an electric spark will generate the necessary power to force the piston in the cylinder down and thus impart the power impulse to the crank shaft. As is well known, gasoline is the most generally used fuel for motor vehicles. However all mixtures of gasoline vapor and air do not burn with the same degree of rapidity. A mixture which is too lean or too rich when ignited will not result in maximum power. This fact is appreciated by every carburetor designer and is the reason why specific directions accompany every carburetor sold.

In Europe gasoline is sold under the name of petrol, it taking this name from petroleum from which it is derived. Benzol is the name of anothed fuel much used in some foreign countries. This is derived from coal tar and is produced in the manufacture of coal tar and coke. Benzol cannot be satisfactorily used in carburetors designed for handling gasoline but requires a specially constructed carburetting apparatus.

Before going too deep into the subject of carburetization it will no doubt be well to give the reader some idea as to how gasoline is obtained. Petroleum commonly termed crude oil is found in natural deposits several hundred feet below the surface of the ground. Crude oils may be classified into two general grades, one having the asphalt base and the other the paraffin base. The former in the United States is found in Oklahoma, Texas and California while petroleum having the paraffin base comes mostly from Pennsylvania and Ohio. It was formerly supposed that crude oil of a paraffin base was of a higher grade but authorities advise that the modern methods of refining place both kinds on a par. The petroleum as taken from the ground is placed in large retorts and heated. When the temperature reaches approximately 100 degrees Fah. a vapor starts to come off. This vapor is caught at the top of the retort and conducted to a condenser where, by the application of cold, it is condensed to a liquid. As the temperature is raised heavier vapors start to come off and when condensed form the heavier or less volatile fuels. On a general average crude oil is said to be composed of from 10 to 15 per cent highly volatile oils; 65 to 75 per cent kerosene and light lubricating oils and from 15 per cent to 20 per cent heavy oils, paraffin wax, etc. Highly volatile oils such as gasoline, benzine and naphtha come off at a temperature ranging between 100 and 125 degrees Fah.; kerosene and light lubricating oils at 125 to 250 degrees Fah., and heavy oils, etc., at a temperature above 250 degrees Fah.

EARLY TYPE OF FLOAT CARBURETOR

When the gasoline rises to the mouth of the spray nozzle the float has risen to a sufficient height to cause the float valve to shut off the supply of gasoline flowing from the storage tank. The downward stroke of the piston in the cylinder creates a suction that draws air through carburetor. As the air passes the spray nozzle it sucks out some of the gasoline in the form of spray which, during the travel to the cylinder, mixes with the air and forms an explosive mixture.

Everyone knows that heat is required to vaporize water. For instance a pan of water may be left outside in cold weather for a long time before the water will be evaporated while on the other hand if water be boiled, 212 degrees Fah. being the boiling point of water, it will soon disappear.

The same principle applies to gasoline. If this fuel be heated it will vaporize quicker. To insure quick action in complete vaporization a stove is usually placed around the hot exhaust manifold and a flexible metal tube run to the intake air opening of the carburetor. As can naturally be expected the air passing around the hot exhaust manifold is rapidly heated and therefore when admitted to the carburetor is warm.

Carbureting devices may be divided into three general classifications, spraying, surface and bubbling. The sprayer is the type now in nearly universal use and will therefore be the one taken into consideration. In this type the gasoline is first reduced to a fine spray and then mixed with air so that the two unite into a perfectly combustible mixture during their travel from the carburetor to the combustion chamber in the cylinder.

The float feed type of carburetor is the one in general use. By this is meant that the amount of gasoline taken into the carburetor at one time is controlled by float action. The float is so set that when the fuel rises to a certain level a valve is brought into play which shuts off the gasoline supply from the main storage tank. This type of carburetor really has two chambers, one for the float and the other for the spraying jet, the latter being in direct communication with the engine. An early type carburetor which is nevertheless a good one for the reader to obtain the elementary principles involved, is shown in the accompanying illustration. In the coming installments the different types of present day carburetors will be discussed

Some Helpful Hints

Patching Oil Wicks

More than one motorist has had much of the pleasure taken out of night driving through one or more of the oil lamps used on the car suddenly failing to burn. Upon investigation it is often found that there is oil in the lamp but the wick is too short to reach the fuel. If a new wick or one of suitable length is not at hand the emergency may be met by patching the old wick. This can be done by binding a piece of waste by means of a rubber band or string to the end of the wick. The waste reaching into the kerosene readily takes up the fuel and thus passes it on to the wick.

Inflating Tires

Tire pressure gauges are inexpensive and should form part of each car's equipment. If tire expense is to be kept as low as possible it is necessary that the tires be properly inflated. However in the absence of a gauge a tire manufacturer has suggested a method which if closely followed will result in the tires receiving the proper inflation.

When the car is fully loaded start to pump up the tires. With a pair of calipers or other suitable tool measure the top of the tire, that is, the widest part of the tire which is located under the mudguard. Next measure the tire at the bottom or in other words the widest part of the tire which is contacting with the road. When the part contacting with the road measures approximately nine per cent greater than the part measured at the top, the tire is properly inflated.

Maintaining Traction

Tire chains should always be used for winter driving. Particular care should be taken to adjust them properly. A chain properly adjusted will be able to constantly shift around the tire and in this way will not subject any one point of the tire tread to excessive wear. On the other hand if the tire chain is tightly adjusted, it will be unable to move and will cut into the tread rapidly. Should at any time the rear wheels lose traction and upon investigation it is found that the tire chains have been left at home a rope will act well as a substitute. Wind the rope around the wheel between spokes and securely tie the ends.

Cleaning with Alcohol

Wood alcohol is said to be highly recommended as a cleansing agent for cloth, leather upholstery, etc. Apply with a sponge or soft cloth.

Keep Springs Lubricated

The riding quality of any car will be greatly improved by keeping the springs properly lubricated. This does not mean only the spring shackle bolts but also the friction surfaces of each spring leaf. At least once a season spread the leaves apart with a screw-driver or some similar wedge-shaped tool and spread a little graphite grease over the surface of each leaf.

Questions Answered

REMOVING CARBON.—I run my own car and am interested in COMFORT'S Auto Department. Can you give me the recipe for carbon remover to be run into the cylinders through the petcocks or through the spark plug holes? J. W. J., Terre Haute, Ind.

A.—There are several preparations that can be purchased at a very low price for removing carbon from the cylinders by chemical action. Although the writer is a firm believer of scraping and also the oxygen method for removing carbon, yet there are many who advocate the injection of denatured alcohol or kerosene into the cylinders. To use either of these liquids the motor should be allowed to run until thoroughly warmed up after which the alcohol or kerosene can be introduced into each cylinder, allowing it to remain there for about six or eight hours. About a teaspoonful placed in each cylinder will be sufficient. Some advocates of this method advise that the best results can be obtained by treating one cylinder at a time. Turn the motor over until the piston is brought to the height of its upward stroke and then pour in the fluid which is said to gradually loosen the hard carbon accumulation so that it is broken up in small pieces and carried out with the exhaust gases when the motor is started. One of the chief objections to this method is that a piece of carbon is apt to become trapped between the exhaust valve and its seat thus preventing the valve from fully closing.

WANTS A MORE POWERFUL ENGINE.—I live in a very rough country and I find my * * * * 20 has not the power I need. I met with a little accident; one of the connecting rods got loose and punched the head out of the cylinder. For about what it would cost to repair this damage I can get a 25 or 30 horse-power rebuilt motor and install it in my car. Do you advise me to do this? Would my frame and chasis stand the extra power? W. W. D., Granton, Okla.

A.—The question you ask is a difficult one to intelligently answer. The writer has never conducted an experiment such as you wish to try and it is therefore a debatable point whether or not the same would turn out to be a success. As a general thing the designer of a car frame takes into consideration the type of motor which the frame is intended to carry. If it is possible for you to find a motor of greater horse-power which can be installed in your car and connected up without considerable expense and redesigning it will be nothing more or less than a piece of unusual good fortune. The company which makes your car is a reputable one and we therefore believe that before purchasing the new motor you take this matter up with them. It may be that your motor is out of adjustment, and if it were repaired and given a good tuning up by the factory mechanics perhaps its performance might meet your requirements. If such is not the case the manufacturer may be in position to furnish gears of a lower ratio for the rear axle. While such a change might slightly decrease the speed of the machine the power developed by the engine would be materially increased.

My Lady O'Crinoline

following her eyes, I noted a thin line of smoke coming down the big staircase, which increased momentarily.

"'Oh, you heartless wretches!' she screamed in terror, 'you have set the house on fire!'

"'It's not true!' I cried in turn. 'It's not true! Those boys are faithful and decent! They have sisters and womenfolk at home. They would not do it out of mere wantonness, I swear it!'

"The servants had discovered the conflagration and came in howling and screaming. The young women issued from the dining-room with pale, scared faces. The girl's mother screamed out:

"'Merciful heaven! Hal is up-stairs, asleep!'

"'Where is his room?' I cried, 'tell me, young lady!'

"'I'll show you!' she cried. 'Up—at the head of the stairs.'

"'No, no, remain here. You cannot take a chance. I'll go!' I thrust her back, and sprang up the stairs, through stifling smoke to the door indicated. I threw it open, it was already weakened by the fire and fell to pieces, throwing up a deflagration of sparks, while a blast of flame shot forth, through which it seemed sheer folly to spring. But with a disregard for that, and thinking only of those terrorized scornful eyes below, I made the spring and to the little bed in the corner. The smoke had stupefied the lad, so I grabbed him up, in one hand, and with the other picked up a chair which I crashed through the second window, for the fire was blazing about the window nearest the door. I staggered through the smoke, to the window and sat upon the ledge and shouted out to my men below. They threw up a rope which I fastened about the lad and let him down then I crawled out upon the window ledge, hung for a moment, then dropped. The men below held a blanket, and into this I fell without any worse effects than a nasty jolt.

"Then we set to work to put out the fire, but it was futile. We did what we could, but the building burned merrily, and soon only the walls were standing.

"My Lady o' Crinoline had stood by all the time, from the moment I let down the boy, until I dropped myself. A dozen willing hands took care of the lad, but the girl stayed near me, and as I stood by watching the smouldering ruin, she cried:

"'Look at your handiwork! You have made the home of a widow a blazing pyre. Admire it! Is it not an act worthy of gentlemen?'

"I could not blame her in her despair, but I knew we were guiltless.

"'You wrong us,' I cried, 'I swear you are wrong. My men were stationed below. How could they have started the fire?'

"At that moment the old colored mammy came up to her young mistress's side.

"'Oh, Miss Virginia,' she wailed, 'Marster Hal am all right, but I done ought to tear an' beat myself to pieces. I put de lighted candle on de table near de window. Marster Hal, he wanted a light to watch fo' de Yanks, an' so I left de candle lit, meanin' by an' by to put it out. I guess de wind done blowed de curtin into de light, an' started de fire!'

"The truth and probability of the negress's statement flashed to us. The fire had raged in that corner of the room where that window was. It was my vindication.

"'Go, Dinah,' the girl said, and we were alone. For some moments we stood gazing at each other in the flaring light of the fire. Then in proud humility, the girl extended her hand.

"'I am not so proud that I cannot admit a mistake; nor can I leave you without an apology I am sorry; I ask your forgiveness. But remember always that I—that I——'

"Her voice trailed off, but I knew what she would say.

"My hand trembled as I took her outstretched one. Its soft touch thrilled, yea, unbalanced me.

"'My Lady, my Lady o' Crinoline!' I cried. 'Don't hate me! For tonight I have begun to live and I—I—Oh, dare I say the word that you will consider an insult?—I love you! When this war is over, I shall return; I shall find you, and you shall love me. The time will come when you will reverse your opinion of me which you set forth in my Valentine. Valentine, precious message, even though it was intended to be insulting.'

"'Go, I do not wish to listen to you,' she said, but I saw signs which even her fine control could not hide.

"'I shall obey,' I answered, 'but my love will ever be in mind, and so beget yours. Think of me, my lady, and believe I am honest in my love. If neither bullet nor disease claim me, I shall come again. For I love you, my lady, love you as it is every man's privilege to love when love is honest and sincere. You shall find in me a true heart, which will serve you as honestly as it does the cause you now so hate.'

"A carriage drove up then, and a girl friend sprang out and took the beautiful creature away. And that night, I dreamed of her."

The Colonel stopped. "You were named after that lady, my dear," he said, turning to Virginia.

"Named after her? Why, I was named after grandmother!"

"Well that's merely another way of saying it, I suppose," the Colonel smiled teasingly.

"Then the lady was grandmother?"

"Do you think I'd dare tell this story, if it hadn't been—grandmother?" he queried.

CHAPTER IV.

A PERPLEXED GENTLEMAN.

"There," said Agatha, triumphant but exhausted, waving the towel with which she had been polishing glasses and retiring to a distance to survey their glittering ranks where they stood on the handsome old sideboard in readiness for the man who was coming from Highbury to act as waiter. "No one would ever know all those had not been used for years!"

The three girls stood and surveyed the scene of their labors in silence. The great dining-room, hung with Spanish leather, in which forty people could have dined, was cut off by high gilded screens to a quarter of its size, making a cozy corner in front of the fire, where the table was to be laid for the little party of five.

"If Clarence Mayne could only see us!" Nerine cried, with that rare fresh laugh of hers which was the very spirit of mirth. "How he would put his glass in his eye and survey the scene!" she added, with an appreciative glance at the antique silver and the bunches of pink chrysanthemums which adorned the table.

"Well, he can't see us," returned Agatha, practically, "so we need not think about him. Let us go and have some tea and take our ease till it's time to dress. Nerine, you might go and find Maurice——"

"Not much need," interrupted that person, appearing with a large basket containing champagne, burgundy and sherry. "I am about choked with cobwebs and straw, and half frozen besides in that beastly cellar. I say, girls, Mr. Mayne has made a pretty good hole in our wine!"

"Don't leave it here, Maurice. Give it to Jane," said Agatha. "The man who is coming to wait might drink it all before dinner."

It was well on to half-past seven when the expectant host and hostesses went up-stairs to dress. The waiter had arrived and was laying the table. Jane was bustling round her kitchen in a state of great excitement, and Ellen, her sister, a girl of sixteen, who had opportunely called on a visit and had been pressed to remain for the important occasion, as her services might be needed, was meekly and mildly doing whatever she was bidden, while her mouth watered at the savory smells pervading the kitchen. As the clock struck eight the door bell rang rather faintly. Mr. Mayne had long ago abolished the knocker which lacerated his nerves.

"You run up, Ellen, and tell Hall you'll go to the door. He's a-making the salad for me in the pantry. This ain't anybody yet—it's too early. Dinner ain't till half-past eight."

Ellen departed, giving her message to Hall, the waiter, as she passed through the pantry.

The great hall was quite dark as she reached it. (Maurice in lighting the dining-room and the drawing-room having quite forgotten it), and the various fastenings of the hall door responded but slowly therefore in her unaccustomed fingers.

On the steps stood a tall man wrapped in a voluminous inverness cloak. Satterlee had dressed at the club and walked the few steps between it and Lispenard House. Eight o'clock, he supposed was the dinner hour, though neither Lispenard nor his sister had mentioned one.

He walked into the dark hall accordingly like one who is expected. The maid who had answered the door closed it after him and moved on in the dark toward the interior of the house. Satterlee could just distinguish her figure in the gloom, and followed her quickly, not to lose sight of her. Never having been in the house before, he had not the vaguest idea where to go.

Ellen, hurrying on in front, looked over her shoulder to see the large and silent figure striding rapidly after her. She meant to turn into the pantry to ask Hall what she was to do, and missed the turning; before she knew what she was doing she found herself mounting the pitch-dark back stairs. Suddenly she began to run.

What if she had admitted a robber or a burglar like she had read about in the newspapers, and he was coming after her to kill her! Jane had said it was too early for the gentleman, and any one else would have given some message, or at least asked if anyone were in. Ellen's stout country legs fairly flew up the dark and twisting stairs. Behind her came Satterlee, three steps at a time, completely bewildered, but determined not to lose sight of the only guide he had in this peculiar house.

Ellen's overwrought sensibilities gave way; already she could feel a burglarious hand clutching the skirt of her dress.

"Go down, mister, go down!" she shrieked. "You've made a mistake!" And as her pursuer stopped in wild surprise, at this form of address, she whisked round a corner and after some false starts found her way to Jane's bedroom, where she crouched trembling with fright, unable to move.

"Well, upon my word!" thought Satterlee, brought to a dead stop on the dark stair. "This is the most remarkable house to come to dinner in. What got into that girl, I wonder? I'd have done better to have sat on the doorsteps till Lispenard came down."

He made a cautious step or two upward, and found himself apparently on a landing from which two passages branched in opposite directions. Should he try one of them or should he go back? Whichever he did, it was very awkward in a strange house. And at the awful thought that an incautiously opened door might bring him into the female apartment of Miss Lispenard or her sister, Lord Satterlee quailed.

He turned to retrace his steps through the perfect silence of the dark house back to the front hall and the door. But though he descended a staircase, it was not the one he had come up, and it led him into a baize-covered passage in which his feet made no sound.

With an abruptness with which inclination had nothing to do, Satterlee's handsome face brought up against a baize-covered door, which, luckily for his nose, gave way before his involuntary onslaught; then as he made a step forward with a hearty exclamation it swung to behind him.

"Confound this place!" he said aloud. "And confound my nose. I believe I've broken it!" feeling that feature crossly. The darkness in the room was almost palpable. After a little ineffectual groping to try and discover some furniture, a mantelpiece or table where there might be matches, Lord Satterlee found he had completely lost his bearings. Furniture there was in plenty, judging from the various things he had violently bumped against, but it seemed to be stowed anywhere and everywhere in confusion. When he had stubbed his toes for the fifth time he sat down in the dark on the last object which had assaulted him. It was a small table, which upset under him; and after this last downfall he sat where he was, utterly bewildered.

It was of no use to ransack his evening clothes for matches; he had none. Presently he spoke softly to himself in the black darkness:

"Well, I'm dished!"

CHAPTER V.

THE LOST GUEST.

Up-stairs the toilets of the ladies were slowly progressing. Kit, gazing at the glory of a white crape frock made over shimmering peach-colored satin, was rather mournfully wondering if she ought not to put on something not quite so fine because of the forlorn condition of the wardrobe of her hostesses.

"I must look nice, but I mustn't look too nice!" she remarked to those ladies. "It would be too horrid of me."

Nerine laughed where she stood behind Agatha, deftly coiling her sister's smooth, fine hair. The three were dressing in Kit's room, for the sake of the fire and the Lispenard festal garments lay on a chair in a heap, with a great want of respect for their age and sobriety.

"Make yourself as fine as you can, my dear!" Nerine said, gayly. "Agatha and I are so much handsomer, to begin with, that your efforts will all be required to outshine us!"

"And it's high necked!" Agatha chimed in, rather vaguely referring to the exquisite garment on the bed. "Oh, Nerine, that pin punctured me!" with a muffled shriek. "Give me the glass. I'll finish for myself."

"You are finished," returned the executioner, calmly running another large pin into the hair of her victim, which grazed the skin with some energy. "You may suffer, but your hair is done with divine elegance!"

As she spoke she gave a hasty glance at her own hair, and she twisted it up with as little care as though she were going to dine with Mr. Mayne. It was not so smooth as Agatha's, perhaps not so fine, and it rippled a little when it was brushed back from her low Greek forehead. Without another look at the careless classic coil, the girl slipped on her gown.

"If only I wrote for the Lady's Pictorial, I should say that 'the gowns of green velvet worn by the Misses Lispenard owed their charm to the antique simplicity of their style,'" she remarked as she buttoned the worn old dress, whose only trimming was a ruff of heavy yellow lace about the throat, a far more fashionable one, somehow, than Agatha's, though it was made of the selfsame duchesse point. Nerine's slim, round throat rose out of it like a stately flower stem; her hands were white and fine against the worn pile of the dull-green velvet, whose long, clinging skirt trailed unheeded after her.

"How slow you two are!" she said, leaning an idle elbow against the mantel while she warmed her shabby shoe on the fender. She was delighted at the flavor of forbidden fruit which hung about this dinner party: doubly delicious was it to contravene the orders of the absent Mr. Mayne and to have so young and good looking a guest. She fairly bubbled over with laughter and nonsense as the other girls dressed.

Agatha, on the contrary, was very silent. A vague feeling of worry and trouble oppressed her. Something might go wrong about the dinner, and she was sure Lord Satterlee was very particular. And then the many Sundays when at afternoon service at St. Jude's she had felt his eyes upon her as she sat devoutly listening to the sermon were too fresh in her mind to make her anything but nervous. How dreadful it would be if he thought she had suggested his being asked to dinner!

"Agatha is a typical hostess isn't she, Kit? Look at her knitted brow of anxiety about her repast. She might be having ten lords instead of one. By the way, he ought to be here; we ought to be down-stairs," with a look at Kit's little gold watch lying on the mantelpiece. "Do you know, my good girls, that it is nearly half-past eight?"

A bang at the door interrupted her.

"Girls, where are you?" shouted Maurice, and without ceremony he burst into the room. "What? Aren't any of you down-stairs? Then where on earth is Satterlee?"

"He hasn't come yet," Agatha returned, calmly. "Where should he be?"

"He came half an hour ago!" replied Maurice, wrathfully. "And that idiot of a sister of Jane's thought he was a burglar or something and ran away and hid in the attic. Jane's just told me; but neither she nor I can find Satterlee, and I suppose he must have followed that ninny of a girl up-stairs and can't find his way down."

"How do you know it was he?" Agatha stood aghast with horror. None of her forebodings had come up to this.

"Who else could it be? Give me one of those candles and I'll go and look for him in the garret."

Kitty Belton sat down weakly and went into fits of laughter. She had finished dressing, as had Nerine, while Agatha still stood with her gown half-fastened, too terrified to proceed.

"Fancy him up in the garret in the dark!" Kit exclaimed. "What do you keep in the garret, Agatha? There are old mouse traps, I suppose, and chairs without any legs, and——"

"Why did he go up there?" interrupted Nerine as Kit became speechless with mirth.

"He followed Ellen, of course. What else could he do?" But Agatha got no answer to her indignant question.

A sudden flash of inspiration had checked Nerine's laughter. Like Maurice, she seized a bedroom candle and flew out of the room. If Lord Satterlee was not down-stairs and Maurice did not find him in the garret could he have possibly found his way into Mr. Mayne's part of the house? If so, he could never find his way back again in the dark.

Down the stairs the girl hurried as Maurice was striding up them, and along the baize-covered passage to the door which was the back entrance to the very palatial suit of rooms of which her stepfather had possessed himself.

But when she reached the door there was no sign of Satterlee. Nerine stopped short. Surely Mr. Mayne could never have forgotten to lock that door when he departed. If so, perhaps the last guest had found his way into the sacred chamber!

She gave the swinging door a vigorous push. It had no handle, only a peculiar catch on the inside, from which it only could be unfastened. It was hard and fast.

Nerine gave it a shake, more from impatience at the impossibility of her brilliant idea than from anything else.

"Then he must be in the garret," she said aloud. "He can't have got in here."

She was turning away, when a sound of rapidly displaced furniture inside the locked door startled her.

"Good heavens! Could Maurice have been mistaken and it had been Mr. Mayne who had entered the house so strangely, and not Lord Satterlee at all?"

Nerine knocked angrily at the door. If it were Mr. Mayne she would make him declare himself. He should not dare enter their house like a thief to spy upon them!

"Who is there?" she cried in her young, fresh voice, grasping her heavy silver candlestick hard the while. Suppose it was neither Clarence Mayne nor Satterlee she had heard, and in another minute she had to defend herself from a burglar?

"Answer me at once!" she commanded. "Is it you, Mr. Mayne?"

A strong and pleasant voice, assuredly not Mr. Mayne's, came rather ruefully from the other side of the door.

"It is I—Satterlee. And I can't manage to get out."

"How did you get in?" she demanded, with a total want of manners.

Lord Satterlee in the dark relapsed into helpless laughter. Who had ever gone out to dinner and been locked up and interrogated like this by his hostess? For he knew it was his hostess—he could recognize Miss Lispenard's voice.

"I—I followed the servant—and—managed to lose my way in the passage." He worded it as respectfully as he could, but for his life he could not help laughing as he remembered the flying maiden who had shrieked at him to go down.

Nerine did not laugh.

"Was the door open?" she inquired.

"It was—luckily for me. I brought up against it and it swung open. But it seems to have catched now."

"It has?" Nerine remembered the only time she had ever entered that room. Wild with anger at some order of Mayne's, she had run down that passage—a hot-headed hoiden of fifteen—and burst in unbidden, through that very door. She remembered how, five minutes after she had turned to go out again, tears of useless wrath and futile passion at the failure of her errand blinding her, Even now she heard the bland tones of her stepfather's hated voice as he directed her, with calm politeness, to press a certain spot in the baize-covered surface of the door.

"Put your hand on the crack of the door," she ordered Satterlee. "Now feel about an inch inside the edge, rather high up. Can you feel anything hard?"

There was silence. Nerine could hear her own heart beat. Could Mr. Mayne have altered the fastening?

"Can't you find it?" she impatiently asked.

"No. I'm very stupid. Wait a minute. I think—I do," fumbling doubtfully.

"You do; you must!" the girl cried. "Push it; up, I think—any way it will go."

Almost as she spoke the door swung forward. As she moved quickly out of the way the light of her candle fell on the imprisoned guest as he towered in the low doorway.

It fell, too on Nerine herself in her velvet gown, with her head thrown back a little and her graceful, milk-white throat rising from the yellow old lace she wore. Satterlee thought he had never seen a lovelier sight than this tall, black-haired girl, holding her candle. But he thought, also, that it was Agatha!

"You will never ask such an unfortunate duffer to your house again, will you?" he said, holding out his hand. "I do not see how I managed to make such a consummate ass of myself!" his blue eyes full of mirth.

"It was not your fault; it was Ellen's," Nerine explained. "As for coming here again," laughing, too, "it is you who will probably never want to do that."

As she spoke her eyes fell on the table which Lord Satterlee had knocked over and on the disordered furniture. That must be put straight, and if once the door were shut she might not be able to get it open again.

"Hold the door," she said, abruptly, "if you don't mind. I must pick up that table."

As she spoke she crossed the threshold which she had never meant to cross until Mr. Mayne had left the house forever. Satterlee would have followed and repaired the havoc he had wrought, but she would not let him leave the door.

As Nerine picked up the fallen table a small drawer in it caught her eye. It was open from the fall, being apparently a secret receptacle, and a small book had fallen out of it. The little book was covered in Russia leather, and on it in letters of raised silver was a monogram, one of whose corners was loose and pricked her finger.

Nerine looked down quickly. The letters were E. L., Esther Lispenard, that meant. The book had been her mother's.

Without a word and without the faintest compunction, the daughter slipped the book into her pocket. Clarence Mayne had enough of her goods without it! She snapped the drawer to.

"Come," she said, turning to Satterlee, who had not seen her action. "Do you know that Maurice is nearly distraught about you? I left him hunting wildly for you in the attic."

They both laughed as they hastened through the house to the drawing-room, where Kit and Agatha were waiting.

"Then it was you," Satterlee demanded, "who thought where I might be?"

"I never really thought, though, that my stepfather would have left that door open. I suspected only that you had got into that passage."

Nerine opened the drawing-room door noiselessly. There were Kit, Agatha, and Maurice, all agitated; Kit hilarious, the others wrathfully despairing.

"I wish that confounded girl had been drowned in the Tyne before she came here!" Maurice was saying. "I've looked everywhere but in the coal cellar, and——"

He stopped short at the welcome vision of Satterlee, whose attire bore no traces of a sojourn in that grimy retreat.

"Well, I'm blessed!" he remarked. "Where have you been?"

Agatha, with wild relief in her heart, came forward quickly, holding out her hand with a kind of gracious shyness.

"What must you think of us?" she said.

Satterlee glanced at her then back at her sister, as he shook hands. Honestly, he was not sure, even now, which of the two sisters he had seen so often in church.

No one noticed his silence, for Nerine was recounting how and where she had discovered him, and Maurice, somewhat impatiently, was desiring to give Agatha his arm and take her in to dinner.

"You must be starving," he remarked as he followed him with Nerine and Kit. "And if the dinner's burned to ashes we'll all go in a body and execute Ellen—eh, Agatha?"

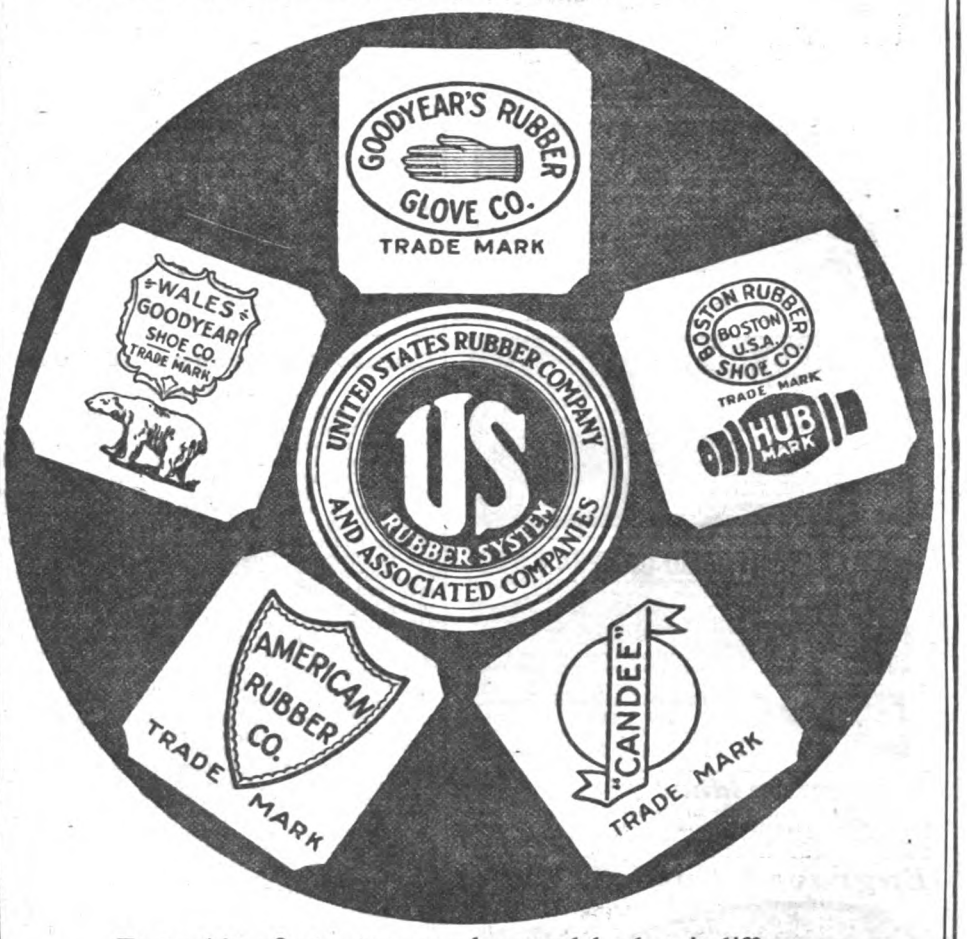
"She deserves it certainly," said the girl whose hand lay on Satterlee's sleeve. He looked at her lovely profile quickly. Agatha, he knew, was the Christian name of his Miss Lispenard! He had heard some one say how strange it was that Agatha Lispenard's sister never went with her to St. Jude's.

Perfectly irrationally, Lord Satterleee felt the least bit disappointed that it had not, after all, been Agatha who had divined his whereabout.

CHAPTER VI.

NERINE MAKES A DISCOVERY.

"Nerine!" called Agatha suddenly from her bed.



"What?" Nerine started where she sat bolt upright in her somewhat chilly couch, scrutinizing by the light of a candle a small object which at the sound of her sister's voice she hastily covered with the sheet.

It was late—after one, for Satterlee had not

Rubber Footwear Holds up Colds

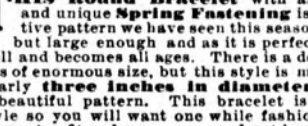
RUBBER footwear is the "Stop! Look! Listen!" preventive to the possible cold. It insulates the foot, keeping out cold and moisture, both of which are frequent causes of "snuffles." Many a cold in the head has traveled all the way up from "cold feet!"

But rubber footwear may be good, bad or indifferent—and only an expert can tell, by observation alone, which is which. So the leading makers put their brands on all their products to protect you. Almost from the very beginning of the rubber industry, these trade-marks have pointed the way to rubber footwear of supreme quality, style, fit and workmanship.

Seventy-four years of successful manufacturing and the experience of forty-seven great factories are back of every pair of rubber shoes, overshoes, arctics, boots, etc., produced by the United States Rubber Company, the largest rubber manufacturer in the world.



Rubbers that fit wear twice as long as rubbers that do not fit.

Uncle Charlie's Home Fund Nearly Doubles in December

UNCLE CHARLIE'S friends will be pleased to learn that the fund, which COMFORT readers are raising for his benefit, to secure him a home and help provide for the necessities of his declining years, nearly doubled in December. On the first of January he reported that during the month previous he had received $351.00, contributed by 536 people. This, added to what he had previously received, brings the total up to $740.00 contributed by 918 individuals.

As the contributions are still coming there is a good prospect that the fund will reach respectable proportions by the third day of February which is the twentieth anniversary of the day on which he was stricken down to linger on a helpless shut-in.

When I say "respectable proportions" I mean that if it doubles again in January, or even grows at the December rate, it will be a respectable beginning, a perceptible help, by the third of February though far from sufficient to buy him a home. But I believe our readers, who started this movement themselves, will keep boosting until they make the fund large enough to be a worthy testimonial of their love and admiration and a substantial help to him.

Now that it has just got in full swing don't let this worthy project fail; don't let your enthusiasm cool; don't slacken your efforts now that success is in sight. Now is the time to work with renewed energy with the assurance that if each does his or her share, together you can put it over in good shape. But it will not do to leave it all to be done by a few—not one in a thousand of COMFORT'S great army of subscribers has contributed thus far. Every little helps, but the total will not be much of a help if 999 out of every thousand leave it to the other fellow to do all the helping.

Remember that I did not start this project, neither did Uncle Charlie; and I was at first reluctant to give it publicity in COMFORT for fear it might not succeed to a degree that would be creditable to its promoters. Now that it is fairly launched it must be pushed to a satisfactory result, which all depends on our readers. Uncle Charlie is in the hands of his friends, and it remains to be seen how many and who they are.

Again let me remind you how you can help:

1. By cash donations.

2. By purchasing Uncle Charlie's books (see advertisement.)

3. Those who cannot spare the money for a cash donation or for purchase of his books can contribute by getting subscriptions to COMFORT in aid of the "Uncle Charlie Benefit Fund" and instead of taking the club premium or cash commission themselves direct that it be credited to the fund. In such cases I will pay over to Uncle Charlie one half of the subscription price of all subscriptions sent for this purpose. The regular cash commission on COMFORT subscriptions is 40 per cent, but for Uncle Charlie's Benefit Fund I will allow 50 per cent. Another way to help him and benefit yourself is to get up a subscription club and take one of his books as your premium.

In one or other of these ways every COMFORT reader who wishes to do so can help swell the fund for Uncle Charlie which has my hearty approval and will have my assistance.

neighbor before he gets a chance to do you, exploiting women and children, and boosting a hold up game of polite piracy. Look across at Europe, and see what education has done there. Look at our own country, the home of the brave and the land of the free with its tens of thousands of youn,, girls herded in vice dens, and its devilish liquor traffic. And what's the cause of it all? Wrong education or no education at all. Give me the children of this or any other land for half an hour a day for two or three months and I'll give you a different world, a world worth living in and a world with something to live for. It is almost wasted effort to tackle the grown ups, but it breaks my heart to think what could be done with young people if somebody would only do it. But there I could take a whole edition of COMFORT and not say half I would like to say on this subject. Andrew S. Draper, State Commissioner of Education of New York, in his annual report says: "I confess that it startles me to find that certainly not more than two fifths and undoubtedly not more than one third of the children who enter our elementary schools ever finish them, and not one half of them go beyond the fifth grade. It is hardly less surprising to find that only about one third of the pupils that go to the high schools remain beyond the second year and that only about one sixth of those who enter remain to graduate. It all indicates that the lives of children are being wasted, that there is a sad lack of definite aim and purpose about it all, and that our educational plans do not rationally meet our conditions." The war is teaching them a good many things in Europe. In England they have discovered that their educational system is all wrong and they have started in to alter it. About a hundred years hence we shall probably do as England is doing. Why not do it now? Alva here is a verse about Tacoma taken from the Goat's joke book.

If you have thoughts of marriage,
And love gets your brain in a whirl,
Just hike off to far Tacoma
And take-home-a Tacoma girl.

WAVERLY, NEBR.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am twelve years old. I go to the Pleasant Valley School, Lancaster county, Nebr. I live a little over a mile and a half from school. We had examinations last week and my grades are as follows: Geography, 100; Spelling, 96; language, 92; Physiology, 95; Mental Arithmetic, 80; Arithmetic, 89; which made my average 92, the highest in the school. My teacher's name is Miss Bessie Malone. I will be in the sixth grade next year. I have fifteen chickens and eleven ducks of my own. I was born on a homestead in Elpaso county, Colorado. I have went to many schools in my live and lived in three states and been in four. We live now thirteen miles northeast of Lincoln, Nebr. I have no brothers or sisters. I have a Scotch collie dog, his name is Woodrow. I have also a cat named Teddy. I always read COMFORT and like it very much. We have taken COMFORT for ten years, but missed it two years moving around.

Your friend,
MATILDA KIEL.

Matilda, I am delighted at the splendid average you got for school work. Waverly, Nebraska, ought to be very proud of you, and believe me I am quite proud of you myself. In mentioning the subjects in which you excel, you give them all capital letters except language. From this I infer you do not think language is as important as geography and arithmetic. I am a little surprised, Matilda, that you were graded so high in language, as I note you say: "I have went to many schools in my life." I have went is a most atrocious vulgarism of speech, a ferocious assault on our language. It is in class with "I seen" and "I done." It is strange your teacher didn't detect you in the act of perpetrating this awful break. Once more let me repeat that bright little story of the boy, whose teacher was determined to break him of the habit of saying "I have went" instead of "I have gone." She made him stay after school hours and write "I have gone" one hundred times. When the teacher returned to school she found the young gentleman had written "I have gone" a hundred times, and after completing he left this little note for the teacher: "Dear teacher: I have written I have gone a hundred times, and now I have went." In a cemetery out West a stone mason chisled these words on a tombstone at the request of a customer whose English he did not dare to correct: "She has went to join the angels." As you are a language expert Matilda, I think you had better write, "I have attended many schools in my life." That is better than "I have gone" or "I have been" to many schools. So Matilda you have a Scotch collie named Woodrow and a cat named Teddy. All you need now is a parrot named Bryan, then you will have a fine political menagerie. Billy the Goat says one thing still is necessary, you should have a monkey called Uncle Charlie. Excellent idea Matilda, look out for me when the walking is good. I'll leave a little note behind for Maria and the Goat, so they will know I have went, I mean I have gone.

KENNA, W. VA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a girl sixteen years old, have light hair and brown eyes.

I enjoy school work. I go to school winter and summer and will pass the examinations as soon as I am old enough. We can't hold a certificate here until we are eighteen. I have read the COMFORT for several years and enjoy your letters best. I live in a beautiful country, among the West Virginia hills. We have no wild animals here, except the rabbit, fox and squirrels. We have lovely flowers, both wild and tame. And Uncle Charlie I am a lover of flowers. Wouldn't you like me to send you a bouquet?

I like to do most all kinds of housework. I can crochet and do most any kind of fancy work. And the best of all I believe in woman suffrage, and hope the day will come when the women of my state can vote.

I like music very much, and now Uncle, here comes the question. Do you think the girls of sixteen are too young to except the company of boy friends?

This being my first letter to COMFORT, will close, with best wishes to Uncle Charlie and all the cousins.

Your new niece, GERTRUDE MILLER.

So you have no wild animals in West Virginia. If you want to see wild animals in all their hideous glory come to New York. We have more wild animals here to the square inch than in the rest of the world put together. There is a place in Fourteenth Street, New York, called Tammany Hall, that contains the most ferocious specimens of wild animals ever known to the zoologist. You simply can't beat this collection. Talk about the mastodon, the dinasaurus and the pterodactyl that roamed the earth hundreds of thousands of years ago, they are not in the same hemisphere with the Tammany Hall tigers. There are likewise a choice collection of wild animals in Wall Street, the saloons, movies and many of the theaters, and even in the churches—wild animals (more or less dangerous) crawling around, seeking whom they may devour. Don't go to the forests, mountains or jungles for wild animals. You are wasting your time if you do; don't even go to the zoological gardens or the circuses, for the wild animals you find in these are but a poor lot of four-legged pikers. Come to our big cities if you wish to see the most dangerous wild animals that have ever infested or cursed this earth. Food dopers, rum sellers, price boosters, white slavers, black handers, stock waterers, crooks, thieves, murderers. They are all here. Some day we are going to shoot up these wild animals and get rid of them. Life won't be worth while until we do. We are an awful lot of boobs to tolerate the presence of these two-legged animal pests. Some day we will get sensible and clean them out. It is the wild animal kings and emperors, nobles, aristocrats and junkers who are responsible for the war in Europe. A lot of them have been killed off but there are still a few hundred thousand we'd be well rid of. This will be a nice old world to live in when we get rid of all the wild animals, the ferocious human squirrels that prey upon the docile bone-headed nuts. I would love to have some of your flowers Gertrude, but it is waste of money sending flowers by parcel post as they are dead by the time they reach me. The trailing arbutus however, my favorite flower, that dainty, modest, exquisitely fragrant harbinger of spring, seems alone able to endure the journey. The arbutus seems to have the ability to survive a boxed up journey, but all other flowers succumb. Three cheers for the girl who can do housework, and who believes in woman suffrage. Gertrude you ask me if girls of sixteen are too young to "except" the company of boy friends. Girls of sixteen my dear, are just at the right age to "except" that company of boys, and just at the wrong age to accept. Before young ladies think about boys they ought to know the difference between except and accept. Except means to leave out, to omit, to object; accept means to take when offered, to agree to, to receive. So many people get these words mixed and often at times with grotesque and ludicrous results. You write a dandy hand, Gertrude, and I just can't understand how you have reached the age of sixteen and have gone to school summer and winter, and expect soon to have a certificate without noting the difference between accept and except, and they differ so widely and completely. Leave the boys alone for two or three years and make them leave you alone. Accept their friendship but when they spring the mush talk, close down the lid and leave them. You'll be happier and have a more contented mind if you do. You will probably get more than a sufficiency of them in later years. Let your girlhood be carefree and happy. Boys often have a habit of making girls anything but happy and at times they make them tragically and terribly unhappy. Am so glad Gertrude, that you are strong for suffrage. Keep pegging away and don't lose heart because your cause lost out at the last election. Agitate and educate and you will eventually tame those two-legged wild animals who refused the women of your state a right they possess even in far-away Finland, a Russian possession. Too bad the men of West Virginia, living on the free soil of this wonderful America, should lag painfully behind Finland in granting to women the right to have a voice in choosing men who make the laws under which they must live. The male workers of West Virginia have at times been shamefully maltreated by big, exploiting industrial corporation. The votes of women intelligently used would quickly make the more acute forms of this exploitation impossible. Men who cannot see this must be blind indeed. But there most men are blind to their best interests anyway. People who suffer from political and economic blindness ought to be mighty glad to have women help them to open their eyes.

BRASELTON, GA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Is there room on your knee for a "Georgia Cracker?" age fifteen, five feet tall, weighs one hundred and fifteen pounds, blue eyes, fair complexion and brown hair. Most everybody has an occupation, mine is crocheting, which does my eyes no good. Don't you think I must take up something else? I am almost blind. My pet is a little hen which has but one foot. Wouldn't you like to see her? She follows me everywhere I go. I have four sisters, two of them are married, and five brothers, one married and one in Heaven. I go to school at Thompson Mills, a dandy little town, population about two hundred. I go to Sunday school every Sunday, P. M.

I very often go out in the woods to crack hickory nuts and walnuts, they sure do eat well. Love to all COMFORT readers and Uncle Charlie.

Your niece, EVA JANE LANCASTER.

Eva you ought to be proud of that last name of yours. It is some swell name. You are very foolish to be ruining your eyes with crocheting. Maria and the Goat (and they are both excellent judges) and some other lady friends of mine regard crocheting as a horrible waste of time. If I volplane down the ages on the wings of memory, I can glimpse my two sisters in far-away boyhood, making atrocious, hideous, abominable things they called antimacassars. They took an interminable time to make and it required quite some skill and dexterity I believe to turn them out. They were hideous things however, and they were generally used to cover up some perfectly handsome good-looking chair, utterly spoiling its appearance. I used to gather these abominations up in a heap and hide them, as they violated my canons of taste, and fractured my sense of the artistic and æsthetic. Oriental people have a wonderfully developed sense of the artistic. We occidentals unfortunately have not. The antimacassar craze didn't last long, but it was very deadly while it did last. There are so many pretty and useful things a woman's nimble, skillful dexterous fingers can make with out fooling around with crazy quilts or crochet work. I know an invalid lady who supports herself by making wonderful sweaters and woolen baby wear and she sells what she makes. If your eyes are bad Eva, why make them worse? What the world needs at all times is food. Just now I am paying eighty cents a dozen for new laid eggs, and they are not so extra new laid either, and half of them at least had whiskers when Columbus landed. Some bear the imprint of Noah's typewriter. If you are anywhere near a patch of land, and I guess you are, all you would need to do to become richer than Rockefeller would be to raise one potato and one egg, then you could have a touring car for the one-legged hen and a limousine for yourself. Raising poultry won't hurt your eyes. Nearly all the food in Europe is being raised by women. They don't say to a woman in England or France now, "your place is in the home." Instead they say "your place is out in the wheat field or the cabbage patch." It is wonderful how quickly man can find a different place for woman as soon as he gets in a tight spot and wants help. Bathe your eyes in a solution of boric acid water. You can get an eye cup for five cents, and all the boric acid you want for another five cents. Now invest a dollar in a magnifying glass, and you will be able to read the finest print. Those foolish people who write me that they can't read portions of COMFORT because of its small print, make me very weary. A magnifying glass big enough to take in a whole line at a time will make the smallest COMFORT print nearly as big as a house. I don't need a magnifying glass to read by, though the faint pencil scratchings of you boys and girls, have almost ruined the best pair of eyes in the world. It is absolutely necessary however to keep a magnifying glass handy, so as to decipher some of the names and addresses of those who write me. I've been unable to thank some of the big-hearted souls who contributed so generously to the Uncle Charlie Home fund because their names and addresses were written so carelessly, that all the magnifying glasses in the world could not aid me in deciphering them. Lots of people who live on Long Island (and Long Island is not a state but only a portion of New York State) write L I without any period after the L and I, and they make the I look exactly like an A, with the result that all their books and papers go hiking off to Louisiana. Then they write us letters, call us thieves and want to murder us because they have not got what they paid for. They don't realize that they have wasted time, broken our hearts and forced us to pay a lot of extra postage through their carelessness. What we need in this world is a school for careless people. If we had such a school about nine out of every ten of us would be found in the front row. Never be careless when writing your name and address and don't crochet when your eyes are weak, and don't crochet at all if you can read. The time that has been given by women to what I may call useless needlework, if it had been used for study and brain development would long ere this have given them a vote, banished drink, poverty and war from the face of the earth. Now Eva, rest those eyes and start a chicken, duck, turkey, pheasant and squab ranch, and oh, yes, do raise one potato. Potatoes and eggs are dearer than houses in this section of the world, and if you country people are not all millionaires by now it is your own fault.

YUKON, OKLA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

As I have never seen a letter from this part of the dear state of Oklahoma, I thought I'd venture so far as to write a few words.

As I like to read letters that the descriptions are given, I'll describe myself. I am a girl thirteen years old, have blue eyes, brown hair, a freckled face, a big mouth and am not a bit good looking. I will be in the seventh grade next year.

I live on a large farm. We have some small chickens and several large ones. We have a dog and three kittens, and a number of horses and cattle. We live in a two-story house with six rooms.

I can milk and play the organ sew crochet and bake cakes biscuits, light bread, pies, corn bread and many other things as good as any ordinary person. I live one mile from church and Sunday school and go every Sunday.

Your loving niece, OPAL MCCALLON.

Opal, I congratulate you on not being good looking and having the courage to tell us so. There is an old story which says: "My face is

Granny's Old Piano

How It Plays Spirit Music at Night

By Florence Briney Reed

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

WHEN Elsie Brand returned from a visit to town, and described the fine library tables people were making out of their old-fashioned, square pianos, the Brands rejoiced that theirs had been saved, for Granny's sake, when the new one was purchased.

There, in the dim little parlor, the old piano had rested for years, in silent company with the haircloth chairs, the walnut bureau and other relics of a bygone time. When the Brands built their new house, they left the old log dwelling, their first home, to serve as a wing of the new building. It was used chiefly to house odds and ends of cast-off furniture.

The great old-fashioned kitchen had not been abandoned. Next to it was Dora's bedroom, Dora the orphan, whose willing hands served zealously in gratitude for a home.

The Brand homestead was one of the oldest buildings in the county, and there had been odd tales about it, such as come to be whispered of every old country house. In truth it was dark and lonely looking, with a heavy vine overhanging it, and lilac bushes almost hiding the small-paned windows. And, here it was that the old piano was stored—the piano which could be fashioned into such a fine table, with its carved trimmings and rosewood case. It was just the thing to do, they all agreed, that is, all but Granny. Granny protested.

Granny's protest was not peremptory, but it was an unusual thing for Granny to oppose anything, and the family was amazed. But as Anson's wife said, Granny must not be allowed to interfere, and if she began to insist upon her foolish notions, they must be firm with her. So it was settled, and Brown, the cabinet maker, promised to take the matter in hand as soon as he finished the pulpit of the new church.

Dora's sympathy for Granny, induced her to follow the old lady one afternoon to the long disused old parlor where she found her seated on the haircloth stool before the closed instrument, resting her head on its faded cover of maroon felt. Hearing Dora's step she looked up guiltily.

"It's only me," said the girl, in her soft voice.

"Oh, Dorry," Granny cried, "they're going to chop it up. Going to take out its keys and wires and tear out its heart, so they can make a library table!"

"I call it a shame," Dora exclaimed hotly. "Mr. Brand, surely won't do it if you tell him it's your piano."

"Oh, they don't mean any harm. They just don't understand. I'm an old woman now, anyway, and I shan't be here much longer. Maybe it's all for the best. But, Dorry, it was the first piano in the county, and it's stood right here ever since Pa brought it home for us children. Sundays we played hymns on it, and when there were weddings, we'd play the wedding march on it. And often the babies were carried in here by mother to keep them quiet. How still they'd be, as she fingered the keys! Then, when there was a funeral, we'd close it up, just like it is now. Pa would tiptoe in here and shut down the lid and pull the cover straight and we'd set the flower pieces on it. When it was father's turn to go, I had to close it. It all came over me just now! Oh, it's got my whole life in it, this old piano, and it seems as if it would kill me when they take it away to be cut up!"

Dora was smoothing out the faded cover, and for a minute she was silent; then, as the little old lady wiped her eyes and bravely tucked her handkerchief away, she said, gently:

"Did you play much, Granny?"

No, only hymn tunes. Pa took us over to Dover for our lessons, six miles each way, once a week, but they had no easy ways to teach folks then, and unless you were a born musician, you couldn't hope to be much of a player. But Sister Lucy, my youngest sister, was a fine performer. She learned the 'Evergreen Waltz,' the 'Battle of Prague' and the 'Maiden's Prayer.' I remember in war time, when we got word that her sweetheart was missing, after a big battle, she never wept a tear, but just held her head high and seated herself at the piano and began to play the 'Maiden's Prayer,' and she played it like her heart was broken. How we all cried! Mother beckoned to us to leave her and she stayed in here all by herself until clear dark, playing softly. It was summer-time and the windows were open, and I remember how the frogs down by the pond croaked and the katydids sang while the music ran on like a little wind through a weeping willow tree. Here's some of Lucy's songs." Crossing to the old-fashioned bureau, Granny opened a drawer crowded with yellow sheets of music.

"She didn't live long after her lover, did she?" Dora breathed compassionately.

"No," Granny replied. "She went into a decline the spring after the war ended, and she died before Thanksgiving. She was Pa's favorite, and the piano was really hers. Poor Lucy! She wouldn't rest in her grave if she knew what was coming to it. But I must hurry child; they'll be missing me."

Even as she spoke, the figure of her daughter-in-law appeared in the low doorway.

"Mercy, Gran, what are you poking around in here for? It's like a tomb. You wouldn't catch me putting a foot inside this door, if I didn't have to. Dorry, I must say you keep it beautifully. The dust would be mountain high before I would come in here to dust the old furniture. Come, mother, you'll catch your death of cold in this musty air."

That night, at about midnight, the Brands awoke with a start. Dreamily tender strains of music from the old piano were sounding through the house! With white faces, the family talked over the event at breakfast, recalling to mind the stories they had all heard about the old wing. In early days an Indian had once been killed there, right on the doorstep, and there was a tradition about a child having been found in the snow one cold night not far from the door—a little girl who had afterward died of cold and exposure. Granny listened without a comment. Then she broke in sharply:

"Could any of those ghosts play the piano? I tell you it was the old piano I heard."

"Did you hear it, Dorry?" Mrs. Brand questioned. Dora nodded.

"There, you see!" Granny said in triumph.

From that time on the music was heard as often as twice or three times during the week.

"They played the 'Maiden's Prayer' last night," Granny announced one morning, "as plain as I ever heard anything, the runs going up and the octaves coming down, and the cross-hand part, too." The family stared at her in shocked surprise, as she added solemnly: "That was Sister Lucy's favorite piece."

"Goodness, Granny," cried her daughter-in-law, "who ever heard of such a thing?"

"Lucy's buried over there, across the field, in the old Talbut burying ground," Granny added. "It's not five minutes' walk from here."

At this unanswerable statement, the family exchanged startled glances and the meal ended in silence. The old-fashioned music tinkled through the quiet house at unearthly hours, and when the neighbors learned about it, they nodded their heads declaring that there had always been "stories" about the old Brand place. That the spirit of sweet Lucy, dead and buried fifty years ago, had come back to revisit her old haunts, no one doubted, but why she should return after resting quietly all these years, to terrify the family with her ghostly music, no one knew.

And then Talbut Brand came home. Talbut was a young man of whom great things were prophesied, and his visits were eagerly looked forward to, elaborate preparations being made for his entertainment. At the strange tale of the midnight music, he just laughed, and declared he must hear it before he could say anything. For a few nights it seemed as if his coming had frightened away the gentle ghost. Then the soft strains awoke again and Talbut, roused from a troubled dream, heard them. There could be no fancy about it. The music certainly came from the old piano in the west wing. He dressed hastily and, followed by the thoroughly frightened women, descended the front stairway, and passed through the kitchen to the closed door of the parlor. Knocking sharply on the panel he called Dora. At his command, Dora opened the door, holding her blue kimono about her with one hand and blinking in the lamplight.

"Was it the music again?" she said sleepily. "I've listened to it so much I guess I've kind of grown used to it." Talbut started for the parlor door.

"Let me by, Dora! I'm going into that room!" he cried.

"I always keep the door locked," she explained, as she turned the key.

"You can carry the lamp," Talbut said. "Are the rest of you coming?"

"Mercy no!" cried his mother. "I haven't been near the old parlor since the music first started, and neither have the girls. You go in, if you're bound to. We'll wait outside."

So only Talbut and Dora stepped over the worn threshold into the quiet room. The air seemed to vibrate yet with the music. The heavy felt cover fell in mysterious lines over the rosewood case of the old-fashioned instrument. The girl held the lamp high while Talbut's keen eyes searched every nook and corner.

"This is uncanny," he said, at last. "I certainly heard something like music. It was not imagination. Could a mouse have been running across the strings? Hold the light a little more this way, Dora. Ah, what's this?" He stopped and picked up something which lay in the circle of the lamplight—a spring of faded vine with tender leaves and fine white blossoms. Dora leaned forward and cried in a frightened tone: "Why—it's—it's myrtle, graveyard myrtle! Oh, where could it have come from?"

With a frown, Talbut thrust the sprig into his pocket, and taking the lamp from the girl's trembling hands, replied, "We'll let the matter rest for tonight." Locking the door, the two passed out.

quit. Lots of things can happen in a short time and the hasty bride gets her eyes open too late. Girls, think and be sure before it is too late.

This leads up to the question of large families which I believe in and still I do not believe in. Let us look at the mother in some of these large families. In a few cases we will find her a good-natured, loving woman, having fairly good health. In cases of this sort, the children usually have a good education or at least good enough to enable them to make their way in the world. How was all this accomplished? In some cases the father and mother loved and understood each other and worked side by side and with good luck accomplished the end. In other cases they were not poor to start with or they never would have gotten there. But look again, look at most of the large families you know. Usually the mother has lost her health and strength, her good looks and generally even neatness. The children are not as well educated and they cannot have as many pleasures because they have no fit clothes to wear. I believe that married people should have children. The woman has to have them and she should be the one to say when and how many. If each family would have what could be cared for properly and no more, we would have a different and better world.

I won't talk politics for if I get started this would land in the waste-basket. I merely say votes for women should be granted to all the states and will be in time and I hope that time is not far distant. Let the Antis stay at home and attend to their own business if they want to but I think that after a few times no one could keep them from voting. Some of them anyway.

Best wishes to all, MRS. G.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT READERS:

You asked for the experience of women whose homes were happy and how they maintained them in this way. I have been married over six years and I have often wondered to myself why we get along so well as neither my husband nor myself are anything extraordinary; in fact, I am considered (by my relatives, at least) as rather difficult to get along with. Be that as it may, we are a very happy couple with an adopted son almost five years old, who is as dear to us as a child of our own could possibly be. As I have said, I often wondered what the reason was for our getting along so well and last night I read in the LAKE MILLS, IOWA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have been reading your department in COMFORT for some years and thought you could send me suggestions for organizing a club. There are about fifteen girls and young women in the neighborhood and we would like to organize a social club, something that will benefit each one.

If you can help us in any way we would be very grateful. Sincerely yours, ELIZABETH OTTO.

Miss Otto. Possibly you didn't want your letter and request published, but I feel that you will receive more help from the sisters' letters than I could give you in a personal letter (and I haven't time for very many of them), and more original ideas too. Here is a chance for club members to tell us about their particular club and the good accomplished by it.—Ed.

FINDLAY, 337 East Lincoln St., OHIO.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

After reading so many nice letters from the sisters I want to add my "mite."

I live in a thriving little city of twenty thousands (last estimate). We have good school and churches, and no saloons. Findley was voted dry eight years ago, and has grown steadily, since.

How many of the sisters, I wonder, that live in a city, crave for the country life? Although I have never lived in the country, it has always been my desire to have a home there.

Isn't it wonderful what a real home-like place the Sisters' Corner is? I have made several dear friends through COMFORT, and am always more than anxious to get my paper to read the sisters' letters. We may gather a great deal of knowledge from them.

I am greatly interested in crocheting, so you can see I enjoy other parts of COMFORT also.

Can any of the sisters tell me what will keep a fern healthy through the winter? As soon as there is the least cold weather my fern begins to fail.

I would like to hear from those interested in crocheting, and all others who care to write.

Best wishes to all COMFORT readers.

MRS. C. L. KRING.

Mrs. Kring. A friend of mine whose plants, and ferns particularly, are the envy of all, told me that the only additional treatment she gave her ferns during the winter months was an occasional dose of Castor oil, about a tablespoonful once a week, poured around the roots of the plant. You might try that with your plant.—Ed.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Seeing the door ajar I decided to come in for a chat. I'll sit by Mrs. C. E. Martin and Mrs. C. Smith, as I'm going to give my opinion on the divorce question. In the olden days divorce was not known but now it is an every-day occurrence? The histories of the old Italian cities state that when no divorce was possible, murder by poisoning was committed. Alarming as it may seem, divorce is a better solution of doing away with misery than ground glass, etc.

I think when two people find life together unhappy the only moral course to pursue is separation. It is not fair that either should live a life of misery because someone else thinks divorce a crime. One had better live by one's self and be happy than waste their life by living with someone who is unkind. Some men cannot be pleased no matter how one tries. I heard of one man who made it a point to quarrel with his wife on Saturday so he wouldn't have to share the contents of his pay envelope with her. One Saturday he came home and picked the dust from the cracks in the floor, telling his wife she didn't keep the house clean. Unreasonable? Yes? No?

I agree with May Day in keeping up one's personal appearance after marriage as well as before. Some women forget this important fact. When a woman becomes untidy in her appearance after marriage it looks as though she had been striving for a certain goal—marriage—and after she had reached that goal she didn't care about appearances or anything else.

Crochet cords last much longer than ribbons in corsets and can be laundered without being spoiled.

Will answer all letters enclosing stamp.

Best wishes to COMFORT and all the sisters,

Sincerely, ELVA WALTON.

NEBRASKA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Every time I read the Sisters' Corner I feel that I want to write. It is not only interesting but educational. We will all admit that everyone has a right to their own ideas yet I believe many (if not most of us) think that if the other person doesn't agree with us they are wrong.

Certainly A. B.'s letter on Mother Love in the October number is true and should be remembered by all. Some wish to hear opinions on the divorce question. I agree with Mrs. C. Smith that when people cannot get along together they should get a divorce and go their own ways. I don't mean that after one or even several little quarrels they should quit but after they have tried different ways and means of living peacefully together and then nothing but quarrels and misery follow, then it is certainly better for both parties to

The Lincoln-Shields Duel

By A. G. Morrill

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

FOR a man so much in the fore front of the bitter political strife that made memorable his time and generation Abraham Lincoln had remarkably few personal quarrels. As an outspoken, fearless, aggressive leader he made enemies, but his fairness, magnanimity and imperturbable good humor made it difficult to pick a quarrel with him. A unique exception was his personal difficulty with James Shields in which he became involved through no fault of his own and which brought him to the verge of fighting a duel to save a lady's name from being dragged through the mire of political animadversion.

Shields was an aspiring young politician and held the office of State Auditor of Illinois. The finances of the state were in disastrous condition which called forth severe criticism from the political opponents of the party in control of the state government. The treasury was empty and a harsh measure to enforce collection of taxes was promulgated, of which the most oppressive feature was a refusal to accept payment in State bank bills which constituted the bulk of the money in current circulation among the people. This action was very unpopular and the blame for it in large measure fell upon Shields who was accused of distressing the people in his anxiety to provide the means for the prompt payment of the salaries, his own included, of the State officials, and that too in money that was scarse and of higher value than the kind commonly in circulation.

Shields was vain, pompous, boastful, arrogant, intollerant, quick tempered, quarrelsome and revengeful, which nat rally made him the butt of much ridicule and the target for many witty gibes.

Among the published criticisms that attracted most attention was one in the form of a letter dated "The Lost Townships," and purporting to be written by a poor widow, in the back country, who complained of the hardship of the new tax collection order and contrasted her distressing circumstances with the ease and luxury enjoyed by Shields and the other State officials. It was written by Lincoln, then a rising young lawyer and getting to be somewhat of a figure in politics, and was printed, without his name, in a Springfield paper. It was a telling political thrust but, though it provoked some merriment over Shields' attitude, the personal allusions were not of an obnoxious character to arouse his anger. However, it inspired other wits less considerate of Shields' feelings to be funny at his expense, which soon got Lincoln into trouble.

Some joker published in the same paper a letter purporting to be from the same widow ridiculing the State Auditor unmercifully and winding up by proposing that he square the grievance by marrying her. Shields was wrathy, but even this might have passed without serious consequences had it not been followed by a poem which heaped yet more scathing ridicule on him.

This satirical rhyme was the joint product of two witty, aristocratic young ladies who could not resist this tempting opportunity to exercise their talents in the line of comic verse. One was destined to marry a U. S. Senator; the other, the leader in this fun, was Miss Mary Todd, soon to become Mrs. Lincoln.

Shields was in a furious rage and, believing all the letters and the poem to have emanated from the same source, demanded of the editor the author's name under threat of dire vengeance in case of a refusal. The terrified editor, having obtained a concession of twenty-four hours in which to consider the matter, immediately applied to Lincoln for instructions.

Lincoln's reply was: "If Shields repeats his inquiry tell him that I accept the responsibility for the poem."

On learning this Shields sent his friend, Gen. Whitesides (who was also a State Treasury official), to demand satisfaction of Lincoln, who refused to make any explanation, as none was possible without involving the young ladies whose identity he was determined to conceal at any cost. The General urged Lincoln to return a satisfactory answer in order to avoid serious trouble as he believed Shields to be in a bloodthirsty frame of mind. But his efforts were unavailing and the result was, as expected, that Shields challenged Lincoln to a duel.

Although the law prohibited dueling and Lincoln hated the barbarous practise, he felt constrained to accept the challenge because the sentiment of the community at that time regarded a refusal as an act of cowardice. As the challenged party he had the choice of weapons, and he wisely selected cavalry broadswords of the largest size which, because of his large stature and great strength, would give him an advantage over his adversary. As he told his friends, he did not intend to harm Shields in the coming fray and believed that with his long arms he could keep him off so not to get hurt himself.

To avoid the penalty of the law a little island in the Mississippi river, a "no man's land" which was not within the jurisdiction of any state, was selected as the place for the encounter. Here, at the appointed time the principals, accompanied by their respective seconds and a few friends met. A board was laid on the ground, and across this the combatants were to fight, each keeping always on his own side.

SHIELDS THREATENS THE EDITOR.

Everything was in readiness and the fight was about to begin, but just before the starting signal two mutual friends of the would-be duelists reached the island in a canoe and intervened just in time to prevent the opening of hostilities. Their efforts were successful in persuading the hot-headed State Auditor to listen to reason and accept Lincoln's statement that he had written only the first letter and had not intended any personal indignity. And so a reconciliation was effected without exposing the young ladies to unpleasant notoriety.

Here the matter should have dropped, but Shields and Whitesides were not satisfied to let it rest with such a tame ending, and so the latter in a spirit of braggadocio wrote and published a highly colored account of the affair in which he drew a halo of glory about his friend and himself and cast obloquy on Lincoln. That this was a disastrous blunder they must have realized with mortification and regret when Dr. Merryman's caustic reply appeared in print a few days later. The doctor, who had acted as one of Lincoln's advisers from the beginning of the difficulty and had witnessed its finish on the island, had a genius for dramatic narrative and a remarkable gift of pungent wit and cutting sarscasm so that his version left the Shields partizans utterly discomfited.

Lincoln always regarded the affair as a regretable incident which he would like to forget, yet he held himself not blamable as the quarrel was thrust upon him and there appeared no honorable way to avoid accepting the challenge; and such must have been the verdict of public opinion, for his enemies never deemed it expedient to try to use the incident to his discredit.

Shortly after this episode Lincoln married Miss Todd, and any man base enough to have taunted him for his gallantry in defending, in the customary manner of the time, the honor of his intended wife would have incurred the contempt of the community.

That he held no ill will toward the man who had challenged him to mortal combat appears from the fact that years later, as President, Lincoln appointed Shields a brigadier-general of volunteers. The latter proved his bravery on the field of battle and afterwards was elected to the U. S. Senate.

my fortune." A pretty face might have been a fortune once on a time, but believe me it is more of a misfortune today than anything else. The trouble usually with a girl who is pretty is that she knows she is pretty and becomes so thoroughly conscious of that fact, that whatever charm her beauty might create is utterly spoiled by her egotism and conceit. There is another strange thing about the pretty girl. You will invariably find that she is married off to a homely, cock-eyed, dog-faced guy of a man. The five prettiest girls that I have known during the last ten years, and three of them were great beauties, are married to the homeliest ginks of men that ever came up the pike. And by the way you will rarely find a beautful girl and a handsome man linked together. The handsome man makes a dead set for the beautiful girl, but as beauty and brains seldom go together (except in my case of course) she makes no effort to please him, and as he is accustomed to hero worship he makes no particular effort to please her. What the average woman falls for is not so much good looks, as attention, devotion and a little flattery. These are the breath of her life, and the handsome man is too busy posing and throwing bouquets at himself to hand out much of this line of dope. The homely guy is all determination and persistency, and he can dish out the salve in buckets and will pawn his back teeth to get money to spend on the idol of his heart. He simply dogs the pretty girl's steps, chokes her with candy, and smothers her with flowers, and harasses the life out of her, until there is nothing left for her to do but to marry him in order to get rid of him. The average girl uses a few of the same tactics in stalking down the handsome man, and she generally succeeds in putting the dog collar of matrimony on him at the finish. It sometimes happens that the beautiful girl is jollied into believing that she can make a fortune on the stage or in the movies, but unless she has a bunch of money and somebody to keep a check rein on her, she finds she can't make a fortune at anything unless she pays the price. It is a price that is paid in honor, decency and virtue, not in gold. In the city the pretty girl finds there are a lot of other pretty girls all striving for the same goal as herself. A bunch of swift male hawks are on the trail of each one of them. They flatter her, jolly her, dine her in garish restaurants and finally induce her to drink. She sees all the other girls of her class doing the same thing and what everyone does of course must be all right. After a few months of that kind of life, the bloom vanishes from her cheeks and the paint is slapped on thicker and faster. With her freshness and bloom gone, her admirers go too. Then she begins to think and count up the cost. Her thoughts are not pleasant. Then she takes an extra drink to make her forget, and finally she becomes so homely and haggard that she does not care and when you cease to care that is the beginning of the end. Don't envy the pretty girl. Facial beauty is shortlived. A beautiful mind a lovely disposition, a strong and blameless character, these are the things which live forever. These are the things, if you have them not you should cultivate, and they can be cultivated if you try. Ruth I'm sorry we can't see you when you milk and play the organ. I should awfully like to taste some of that musical milk. You might send us a picture of yourself when you are milking the organ. I should also like to see you crochet sew and bake cakes. That must be even more fun than milking the organ. Doesn't it get awfully tiresome and lonesome? Opal, living in a house with six rooms? I hope the six rooms are all nice well behaved rooms, and trust they are temperate in their habits and not quarrelsome. I think if I were you I would rather live in a two-story house with my folks, instead of six rooms. I'd try it anyway if I were you.

BRASHEARN, MO.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Please inform me what is the present correct way for a young man to wear mourning for his father who has been dead about three months. Should a man wear mourning the same for any relative and how long?

Resp't'y yours,
CHAS. E. STROUD.

Charlie, if you have not already worn mourning for your father, I don't think I would do it now. I believe it is customary to wear full mourning for a year for one's parents, and a shorter period for relatives who are less near and dear. A band of crepe round the left arm on week days and black clothes on Sundays I believe would suffice to show your respect for the departed. I am glad to note that people are not adhering as strictly to external forms of grief and mournful habiliments of sorrow as they did twenty-five or forty years ago. In the olden days it was quite depressing when the death rate was almost treble what it is now to find so many people dressed in somber black. This was especially noticeable on Sundays when one went to church and found half the congregation in mourning. Black at the best is an exceedingly depressing color, and when the heart is torn with grief the whole nervous system is under a severe strain, quite often a dangerous strain. When the body is frail and the heart weak, overwhelming grief is liable to be exceedingly dangerous. The wearing of mourning never allows us for a moment to escape from our sorrows. It is desirable and at times absolutely necessary that one's thoughts should be diverted from the dark channels of sorrow and despair into brighter and more cheerful avenues. If death were annihilation we might well drape the world in black, but it is only a "beautiful adventure" a stepping stone to higher things. We should not allow grief to make us morbid or indulge too much in black raiment and black-edged stationery, and other outward and visible signs of an inward sorrow. There are many people who carry their griefs on their backs and none in their hearts. Let us lovingly remember those who have passed on. Let us give them at least one tender thought every day of our lives, for every day brings us nearer to the time when we shall meet them again. Those whose hearts are raw with the jagged wounds of grief should memorize the following beautiful and inspiring lines:

Yet 'twill only be a sleep;
When, with songs and dewey light,
Morning blossoms out of night,
They will open wide their eyes
'Neath the palms of Paradise,
While we foolish mortals weep.

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers. It was primarily started as a society for the juvenile members of COMFORT'S family, only, but those of more mature years clamored for admittance so persistently that it was deemed advisable to impose no age limit; thus all are eligible to admittance into our League provided they conform to its rules and are animated by the child spirit.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs thirty cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The thirty cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. The Goddess of Lonesome Ranch

By Hapsburg Liebe

PART II.

"WELL, he won't bother around here any more. He'll leave here—fact is," said Allen, "he's done gone."

"But why did you set him free?" demanded Selford.

"Because."

"Woman's reason, and you ain't no woman, Pokerface, by a blamed sight! Say," suddenly, "what are we goin' to do about our bills? We owe—or, rather, I owe—some fierce bills here. It would take a month to write to Lonesome Ranch and have some cattle sold."

Allen rubbed his chin and frowned. "I'm wonderin' if old Ward didn't do you, Bill. Don't you reckon he did?"

"Do me!" flared Selford, resentfully. "Why, he's broke too. He's borrowing money from his friends. No, I don't blame Ward, not in the least, for my bustup. There must ha' been a chance for loss where there was a chance for gain, old pal. No, Ward is on the square and level; you couldn't make me believe nothin' else, if you was to talk to me until you was as blue as ink in the face."

"Well," frowned Allen. "All right. About them there bills you and me owes, you leave that to me. I ain't exhausted none o' my resources yet."

The following morning, Selford was sitting with Miss Ward on the hotel's bayshore veranda, when Allen walked up and bowed stiffly. In one hand Allen held a newspaper and a small package.

"'Ere is the paper, Mister William, sir," he said, "and 'ere is the package from your New Horleans bank, sir. And Bellow, 'e 'as just wired, sir, that there was a' haccident in loading the big car, w'ich is the reason hit 'asn't been shipped; and 'e says, sir, that hit will take a week longer to make the necessary repairs. Hi would like to hask you, Mister William, sir; may Hi 'ave the day hoff to go down to Lester's Point a fishing, sir?"

Selford's jaw dropped. He had been prepared for none of this. But Miss Ward, doubtless, was watching, so he recovered himself.

"Certainly, you may have the day off, Harmsworth, my man," he said evenly. "And I hope you enjoy yourself!"

"Thank you very much, indeed, Mr. William, sir," said Pokerface Allen, and he bowed and left hastily.

Selford's curiosity was at a high pitch. He opened the package as carelessly as he could, and peeped inside. In it there yas a roll of banknotes, most of them of a two-figure denomination, big enough to choke a government mule!

Where had Allen got the money? Had Allen been gambling again? He looked absently out across the bay, and wondered. The answer was not long in coming. Old Ward brought the answer.

"Good morning, Selford," he smiled floridly. "Have you heard the news? No? Simpson Caudle came back and robbed four of the hotel's guests—new guests—last night. He robbed them between the railway station and the hotel. Held them up at the point of a big, blue gun, and took their money in the good old-fashioned way. He had a black mask on his face, too. He got something like six hundred dollars, I understand."

"Is that—a fact!" muttered Selford.

Now Bill Selford knew where his roll of banknotes had come from, and he knew now why Pokerface Allen had liberated Simpson Caudle—Caudle would be blamed for Allen's holdup!

"Have they caught Caudle?" he asked.

"I think not."

Selford rose and went to look for his resourceful valet. Allen had already departed for Lester's Point. Selford returned to his rooms, and there he fell into his old habit of talking to himself:

"It was for me that you done it, Pokerface," he drawled. "You done it so I could stay here and court the goddess. But you oughtn't done it, old pal. It was bad. It was thievery, rotten thievery. And you left as soon as you'd handed me the money, to keep me from giving it back to you. You knowed I wouldn't have it. That is, you thought I wouldn't. You figured that if I had it in my possession long enough, I'd yield to the temptation o' payin' up my scores here. And you figured right, Pokerface. I'll pay our scores here, and some ahead. I can't leave here now, on account o' her. But some day I'll pay them fellows all back, every cent of it, if I have to sell every longhorn and jackrabbit on Lonesome Ranch to do it!"

He went down to the bayshore veranda, and called old C. C. C. Ward aside.

"I've made a raise; if you're still pretty hard pushed, I could let you have a hundred or so," he said in a half apologetic manner.

Ward glanced quickly toward his daughter. Her blue eyes were turned out across the sunlit and shimmering bay. Then Ward looked back to Selford.

"I'll be mighty glad to get it," he whispered eagerly. "Heaven knows I need it!"

And he slipped the money into a trousers-pocket.

Allen came back a little after nighfall. He received no word of chiding from his master, and he appeared to be in high spirits.

Selford did not sleep well that night. He rose early, and dressed himself. He had just finished giving his coalblack hair a careful combing, when there came to his ears the sound of Allen's voice:

"Why, hit's Miss Ward!" Allen was at the door that opened upon the main hallway. "Bless my soul hif hit hain't! And 'ow are you this fine morning, Miss Ward, ma'am?"

"May I see Mr. Selford?" came in feminine tones.

"Certainly, Miss Ward, ma'am!" Allen almost shouted. "Oh, Mister William! Mister William!"

Bill Selford found the girl in tears. There was some difficulty, he knew, and he was glad that she had come to him with it. That augured well.

"Father has disappeared," she told Selford. "I can't find him anywhere. It isn't at all like him to go off without first telling me where he is going. Have you seen him?"

"Not since yesterday."

Neither had the other guests seen C. C. C. Ward since the day before. A search of the old copper man's bedroom revealed only the fact that the bed had not been disturbed; but a little later they found, on the ground near the front veranda steps, the unmistakable marks of a struggle, a few drops of dried blood, and a notebook with Ward's name in it.

"Simpson Caudle again; he took the old man from the veranda, sometime in the night," frowned Selford, speaking to himself. He turned to the anxious-faced girl. "I don't like to inquire into your father's affairs," he said, "but if I'm to do much of anything toward finding your father, it's best that I should know something of the nature of his quarrel with this villain Caudle."

"I can't tell you anyhing about it," replied Miss Ward, hopelessness in her voice. "Father never discussed his affairs with me."

Again they hunted for the missing man. They searched, not only the hotel and its grounds, but all of Lesterville, and the authorities helped. They found nothing more.

When Beatrice went to her rooms at noontime, her maid gave her a note. "Somebody threw it through the transome," she said.

The note was anonymous. It stated that Ward was entirely safe from all harm, and begged his daughter not to worry! The blood on the ground at the veranda steps, the note said, had come from the abductor's nose, and not from any wound of Ward's. Beatrice took the mysterious communication straight to Selford, and again Selford gloried in the fact that she had come to him first—it augured well. He eyed the note carefully, and later compared it with the handwriting of Simpson Caudle on the hotel's register. It was not in the least like Caudle's small, cramped chirography, nor was it in the least like any other signature on the register. But Caudle, Selford told himself, might easily have disguised his handwriting.

"Anyway, he's safe," Selford assured the girl.

She took hope quickly, and then she gave him a smile that reminded him once more of the smile that was on the face of the six-year-old calendar out at Lonesome Ranch.

But she soon grew restless again. Late that afternoon she walked through the grounds with him, and when they had reached an isolated spot she said to him this very pointedly:

"You have declared, a hundred times, your willingness to die for me; to go through fire and water and seas upon seas of blood for me; to endure centuries and centuries of torment for me; to move the entire universe into new quarters for me—and many other impossible things. I don't want you to do anything like that for me. But—I do want you to find my father for me! You seem to me the biggest and the strongest and the most capable man here—and I want you to find him, Mr. Selford!"

She leaned forward her face aglow and her blue eyes shining, and kissed him on one of his sunburned cheeks. There was no one to see; perhaps it would have made little difference if there had been a multitude present. Bill Selford took her into his arms.

"And you love me?" he whispered.

"I do," she admitted. "You're rough, as rough as a cliff but you're as beautiful, under your roughness——"

"And you'll marry me?" Selford interrupted, eagerly. "And go away out West with me, to live on a big ranch that is so lonesome that I named it Lonesome Ranch?"

"Yes. But it won't be lonesome to us. Now go and find my father, will you, my sunburned giant?"

"If he's on earth!" declared Bill Selford.

He went rapidly toward the hotel. Allen met him on the veranda, where a score of guests sat talking over the mysterious disappearance of Mr. C. C. C. Ward.

"Hi s'y, Mister William," began Allen, his countenance as blank as a board, "Hi 'ave a telegram ere from Bellew about the big car, and another one about the big boom in the hoil market. 'Ere they are——"

"Cut it out, Pokerface—saw it off right where you're at!" interrupted Selford. "Hike yourself up-stairs and get into clothes you can ride in! We're goin' to scour the surface o' this mundane sphere until we find C. C. C. Ward, if it takes the rest of our lives—now get that!"

Forgotten forgotten, was everything but Beatrice, Beatrice who had kissed him of her own free will, Beatrice who had promised to marry him. He swept Allen before him, and they dashed into their rooms like a pair of embryonic cyclones. There they dressed themselves in the good old familiar garb of the plains, then they hurried to a liveryman and hired a pair of saddled horses.

"You mean to ride the whole blessed night?" asked Allen, as they entered a broad stretch of jungle.

"Sure. Day and night until we find C. C. C. Ward. He's tied out in some such a place as this, and he may be starvin'. Oh, but I won't do a thing to that villain Caudle!"

"Then I guess I'll save you a lot o' hard ridin,' Bill," muttered Allen, frowning heavily. "Just turn into that there pigpath there at your left, will you?"

Selford obeyed. Twenty minutes later, they drew up before a slender pine, and, sitting at the base of it, with his arms bound tightly around it, was Beatrice Ward's father!

"You done that, Pokerface!" accused Selford, as he dismounted. He quickly cut the ropes, and Ward rose and stretched his cramped limbs.

"I ain't denyin' I done it," replied Allen. "I thought you wasn't goin' to get the girl, and I knowed I couldn't never tell you that Ward was buncoin' you! Why, you loaned him money! If ever I seen a man done gone bust-headed, it was you. I wasn't doin' nothin' but only tryin' to make him give you your money back, you old cayuse!"

"Get my girl!" cried Ward, weakly. "What does he mean—who's going to get my girl?"

"Me," said Selford. "I'm going to marry her. She's promised me she would."

Old Ward went to pieces. He loved his daughter. She was all he had to love. Yes, his copper dealings were a fake. He had dealt honestly in copper until he had become almost penniless—and he had had a considerable fortune to begin with. The girl didn't know; he didn't want her ever to know. Selford could have all his money back, and so could Simpson Caudle—Simpson Caudle, in spite of his villainous appearance, was merely an honest up-country grocer who had been duped just as Selford himself had been duped!

So Beatrice Ward married Bill Selford and became the flesh-and-blood goddess of Lonesome Ranch, but the ranch is not lonesome any more. and Pokerface Allen—he wanders, and wanders, through the vast and silent reaches, and now and then he sings to himself as he wanders:

"I'm a goin' to live, anyhow, 'til I die—
I'm a goin' to live, anyhow, 'til I die!
Anyhow, anyhow, 'til I die—
Anyhow, 'til I die!"

diet, and exercise, and sleep, and pay particular attention to taking care of yourself, especially if you are not feeling well. Keep your ankles warm and do not indulge in much exercise—and be careful not to get chilled or over-tired. Lie down when you can, and let Nature have as much rest as possible. If the "dark pores" are really blackheads, follow the directions in this month's talk of mine. For the brown neck, try the following bleach:

For a Brown Neck

Into one ounce of strained honey stir one teaspoonful of lemon juice, six drops of oil of bitter almonds and the whites of two eggs (without beating). Now add enough fine oatmeal to make a paste which you can spread thinly. Cut a piece of cotton cloth long enough to go about the throat and about three inches in width. Wrap around the throat, and keep in place with several wrappings of surgical gauze or cheese-cloth. You can fasten it firmly with strips of adhesive plaster if you have some in the house. Keep on over night. In the morning wash off. Do this four or five times. Oil of bitter almonds is a poison and you should be careful not to leave it within the reach of children; for this reason, also, do not use this bleach on the face.

G., Hagerstown.—The complexion brush is your remedy for the red, oily nose with enlarged pores. Use nightly. A red nose, and an oily one, frequently comes from an impaired digestion, so be careful what and how you eat. I am inclined to think that your trouble lies here. Also see that the eliminative functions of the body are in free, working order daily, and I believe your nose will improve.

Ethel.—Yes, peroxide and ammonia, applied as I have directed, will remove superfluous hair. As to how long it will take, this varies with different persons, but it is a very slow process. Hair once killed will not return, but other hairs in the neighborhood often spring up. There is no way of keeping the face free from hair, except by constant attention to it.

Mrs. C. S.—I am sorry that the rules of this department prevent my answering letters by mail. As to your questions about your hair, read what I have to say to "Worried."

Blue-eyed, Genoa, Wis.—All yellow hair is "blonde," whatever its shade, so it is evident that you are a blonde. To make it grow heavier and longer, keep it well brushed nightly, shampoo once in two weeks (since your hair is oily), massage the scalp, and look to your general bodily health. See answer to "Worried." As to your hair turning darker, it is quite likely it will as you grow older. For your freckles, if they are not very old it is probable that they can be removed by the following:

Simple Freckle Eradicator

One teaspoonful of salt, one tablespoonful of new milk.

Dissolve the salt in the milk, apply to face and arms (if freckled), let dry, then rub off all the salt that is on the surface. Go to bed, and in the morning wash off as usual. Keep this up until the skin peels.

The fact that you have such a high regard for the publisher of your favorite paper is all the more reason why you will be doubly interested in a letter we have recently received from his wife. Mr. Gannett himself says that the helpfulness and good cheer that radiate from the pages of COMFORT have much of their inspiration from her.

Here is her letter, word for word, just as we received it:

Mrs. W. H. Gannett, Wife of the Publisher of COMFORT,

Writes that She Would Not Take $1,000 for Her 1900 Washer

AUGUSTA, MAINE, Nov. 9, 1908.

The 1900 Washer Co., Binghamton, N. Y.

GENTLEMEN:—I tell my friends I would not part with the 1900 Washer for a thousand dollars. It works to perfection; washing my clothes as white and as clean as possible and doing my washing very easily and quickly. It happened the machine came one of the hottest days of the year, and as my wash woman was late that day I thought it was a nice time for me to give it a good trial. I was certainly very happily surprised to find how quickly and easily a large washing could be done without my getting so very tired. Thus I was able to do my washing, hang out my clothes and visit my friends out of the City all in the forenoon. At another time I arrived home at ten o'clock Monday morning and as the woman I had engaged to help me was ill at home, the 1900 Washer again came to my rescue and I was able to get the washing all done before noon. The more my servants use it the better they like it, and we could not keep house without the 1900 Washer. It has saved the price of the machine many times and there is no wear and tear on the clothes washed in this way.

I am voluntarily writing you this letter hoping it will be the means of helping other housekeepers to overcome some of the difficulties and drudgery of wash day, for if they will only TRY the 1900 Washer I know they will always use it, as I find it works just as well washing small linens as it does for heavy wool blankets or bed spreads and table cloths. Hoping you will be able to place a 1900 Washer in every home in the land, I am,

Yours very truly, (Signed) MRS. W. H. GANNETT.

Electric Candy Shops

Electric confectionery shops are to be found in St. Paul and Minneapolis. The owner of these shops is a great believer in electricity, and he has equipped his tables with candle lamps and desk telephone sets. A customer seats himself at the table, looks at a handy table directory or menu, finds the particular number of the dainty he desires, and gives his order by telephone. A minute later the order is placed on his table by a waiter.

The system says the owner, saves a great deal of time because the waiters do not have to make a trip to the table to find out what the customer wants, nor do they have to wait while the customer is deliberating over his choice.

GRANT WOMEN RIGHT TO PREACH.—The New England Southern Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church went on record, at their annual session, as favoring the licensing of women to preach. A memorial to the General Conference was adopted in which it was urged that "the right to competent women to enter the pastorate be not denied."

she tauntingly returned. "That air of injured innocence is vastly becoming to you, and would be very effective, if I did not know you so well; but it has disarmed me for the last time. Pray never assume it again, for you will never blind me by it in the future."

"Explain yourself, Anna. I fail to understand you."

"Very well; I will do so in a very few words; I was a witness of your interview with the girl just after dinner tonight."

"You?" ejaculated the man. "Well, what of it?"

"What of it indeed? Do you imagine a wife is going to stand quietly by and see her husband make love to her companion?"

"What nonsense you are talking, Anna! I went in search of one of the housemaids to button my gloves for me, met Miss Allen instead, and she was kind enough to oblige me."

"Bah! Gerald, I was too near you at the time to swallow such a very lame vindication," sneered his wife. "You were making love to her, I tell you—you were telling her something which you had no business to reveal, and I swore then that her fate should be sealed this very night."

Gerald Goddard realized that there was no use arguing with his wife in that mood, while he also felt that his case was rather weak, and so he shifted his ground.

"But you must have plotted this thing long ago, for your play was written, and your characters chosen before we left the city," he remarked.

"Well?"

"But you said you had two reasons; what was the other?"

"Emil's love for the girl. He became infatuated with her from the moment of his coming to us, as you must have noticed."

"Yes."

"Well he tried to win her—he even asked her to marry him, but she refused him. Think of it—that little nobody rejecting a man like Emil, with his wealth and position!"

"Well, if she did not love him, she had a right to refuse him."

"Oh, of course," sneered madam, irritably. "But you know what he is when he once gets his heart set upon anything, and her obstinacy only made him the more determined to carry his point. He appealed to me to help him; and, as I have never refused him anything he wanted, if I could possibly give it to him——"

"But this was such a wicked—such a heartless, cowardly thing to do!" interposed Mr. Goddard.

"I know it," madam retorted, "but you may thank yourself for it, after all; for, almost at the last moment, I repented—I was on the point of giving the whole thing up and letting the play go on without any change of characters, when your faithlessness turned me into a demon, and doomed the girl."

"I believe you are a 'demon'—your jealousy has been the bane of your whole life and mine; and now you have ruined the future of as beautiful and pure a girl as ever walked the earth," said Gerald Goddard.

"Pshaw! don't be so tragic," she said, after a moment, and assuming an air of lightness, "the affair will end all right—when Edith comes fully to herself and realizes the situation, I am sure she will make up her mind to submit gracefully to the inevitable."

"She shall not—I will help her to break the tie that binds her to him."

"Will you?" mockingly questioned his wife. "How pray?"

"By claiming that she was tricked into the marriage."

"How will you prove that, Gerald?"

The man was dumb. He knew he could not prove it.

"Did she not go willingly enough to the altar?" pursued madam. "Did she not repeat the responses freely and unhesitatingly? Was she not married by a regularly ordained minister? and was she not introduced afterward to hundreds of people as the wife of my brother, and did she not respond as such to the name of Mrs. Correlli? I hardly think you could make out a case, Gerald."

"But the fact that the Kerbys were called away by telegram, and that some one was needed to supply their places, would prove that Edith had no knowledge of the affair—at least until the last moment," said Mr. Goddard.

Madam broke into a musical little laugh as he ceased.

"Do you imagine that I would leave such a ragged end as that in my plot?" she mockingly questioned. "The Kerbys were not called away by telegram, and no one can prove that either was ever told they were. The Kerbys are still here, dancing away as heartily as any one below, and they have known, from the first, that they would not appear in the last act—they and they only, were let into the secret that the play was to end with a real marriage."

"It is the most devilish plot I ever heard of," said he. "Your insane jealousy and suspicion, during the years we have lived together, have shriveled whatever affection I hitherto possessed for you!"

"Gerald!"

The name came hoarsely from the woman's white lips.

It was as if some one had stabbed her, and her heart had died with the utterance of that loved name.

He left her abruptly and descended the stairs, never once looking back, while she watched him with an expression in her eyes that had something of the fire of madness in it, as well as that of a breaking heart.

When he reached the lower hall, she dashed down to the second floor and into her own room, locking herself in.

Fifteen minutes later she came out again, but in place of the usual glow of health upon her cheeks, she had applied rouge to conceal the ghastliness she could not otherwise overcome, while there was a look of recklessness and defiance in her dark eyes that bespoke a nature driven to the verge of despair.

Making her way back to the ballroom, she was soon mingling with the merry dancers, and with a forced gayety that deceived every one save her husband.

To all inquiries for the bride, she replied that she had recovered consciousness, but it was doubtful if she would be able to make her appearance again that night.

Then as her glance fell upon a tall, magnificently framed woman, who was standing near, and the center of an admiring group, she inquired, in a tone of surprise:

"Why! who is that lady in garnet velvet and point lace?"

"That is a Mrs. Stewart, a very wealthy woman, who resides at the Copley Square Hotel," was the reply.

"Oh, is that Mrs. Stewart?" said madam.

"Yes; but are you not acquainted with her?" questioned her guest, with a look of well-bred astonishment.

"No; and no wonder you think it strange that she should be here by invitation, and I have no personal acquaintance with her," the hostess remarked, with a smile; "but such is the case, nevertheless; a card was sent to her at the request of my brother, who has met her several times, and who admires her very much. What magnificent diamonds she wears!"

"Yes; she is said to be worth a great deal of money."

"She must have come in while I was upstairs, inquiring about Edith," madam observed. "I must find my brother, and be presented to her. Excuse me—I will see you later."

With a graceful obeisance, madam turned away and went in search of Emil Correlli.

But, as she went, she wondered if she could ever have seen Mrs. Stewart before.

The woman's face seemed strangely familiar to her, and yet she could not remember ever having met her.

She met her brother near the door, he having just come in from the house, to excuse himself to his sister, after having been to Edith's door for the sixth time to inquire for her.

His face was pale, his eyes heavy with anxiety.

"Well, how is she now?" questioned his sister.

"She has fallen into her third swoon, and the doctor thinks she is in a very critical state. He says her condition must have been induced by a tremendous shock of some kind."

"Ah!" exclaimed Mrs. Goddard, looking relieved. "Judging from that, I should say that the girl has not yet revealed the true state of affairs."

"No; Dr. Arthur did not appear to know how to account for her condition, and asked me if I knew anything that could have caused it."

"Of course, you did not?" said madam, meaningly.

"No; except the excitement, etc., of the occasion."

"Well, don't worry," Mrs. Goddard returned; "everything will come out all right in time. It is a great piece of luck that she did not wail and rave and let out the whole story before the doctor and the maids. Your Mrs. Stewart is here—you must come and greet her and introduce me," she concluded, glancing toward her guest as she spoke.

"I was coming to tell you that I am going to my room and to bed—I have no heart for any gayety tonight."

"Nonsense! Don't be so absurdly foolish."

"Indeed! I think it would be improper for me to remain when my wife is so ill," he objected.

"Well perhaps; do as you choose. But come and introduce me to Mrs. Stewart before you go; she must feel rather awkward to be a guest here and not know her hostess."

How Oysters Produce Pearls

By C. L. Cheever

IN Japan there is a great oyster farm where the bivales are taught to make pearls. A well-known scientist conceived the idea that oysters might be educated and made to work for man. After many years of costly experimentation Dr. Mikimoto discovered the method in use today.

The farm has an area of about fifty square miles and the water varies in depth from five to fifteen fathoms. The farmer selects the spots where the larva of oysters are most numerous and then he plants small rocks and stones. These are soon covered with oyster spat. They are then removed and placed in special beds, where they lie undisturbed until the third year.

It is said that an oyster will not produce a pearl unless it be irritated by some foreign substance. As soon as it feels this it proceeds to cover it with nacre, layer on layer, until after a few years it has made a pearl. When large enough the oysters are taken from their beds and carefully opened; a tiny speck of some foreign substance is introduced into their bodies, and they are replaced in the sea. By the end of from three to five years the oyster has coated the foreign substance with nacre and this has become a pearl.

All the work on this oyster farm is done by women, who look most picturesque in their diving suits of pure white.

Great fortunes have been made by cultured pearls. The largest cultural banks are located along the shore of the Bay of Ago and operated by a special grant of the Japanese government.

YEAR'S "CONSCIENCE FUND."—Contributions to the treasury's "conscience fund" for the fiscal year recently ended amounted to $54,923.15, making a total of $498,763.54 returned by persons whose consciences were uneasy over frauds against the Government. Figures at the Department show returns were larger during last year than ever before. In 1811 the first $5 came with a letter saying the writer had taken that amount from the Government, and hence wished to return same.

BACHELORS' CARE FOR BABIES.—An order was recently put into effect in Memphis, Tenn., requiring every unmarried man in the city to undertake to provide for the maintenance of at least one baby whose parents are unable to properly care for it. The plan is said to be proving a great success; little ones are provided with many advantages which were formerly denied them. The bachelors seem to enjoy this.

VETERINARY INFORMATION

Subscribers are invited to write to this department asking for any information desired relative to the treatment of animal troubles. Questions will be answered in these columns free by an eminent veterinarian. Describe the trouble fully, sign full name and give your address; direct all correspondence to the Veterinary Department, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Should any subscriber desire an immediate, special opinion on any question privately mailed, it may be had by sending one dollar with a letter asking such advice, addressing as above.

No atttention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

GARGET.—I have a Shorthorn cow, six years old, in good condition. She freshened last June and through careless milking the entire right side of her udder has become badly caked, while the other side is perfectly good. I can only get one half pint of milk from both right teats. The calf is still sucking. B. W.

A.—We consider the condition hopeless and the cow should therefore be fattened for slaughter as soon as the calf is weaned. If you prefer to experiment, wean the calf now, milk three times daily, massaging the udder thoroughly each time and each night rubbing the affected quarters with a mixture of one part of mercurial ointment and three parts of lard or lanolin.

INDIGESTION.—I have a fine young mare with foal that is strangely affected at times and has been for something like a year or eighteen months at intervals, and I desire some advice as to treatment. She will after coming from work, refuse to eat sometimes, and will lie down, and will turn up her upper lip repeatedly. She doesn't seem to swell to amount to anything, and doesn't hold her head at the side much as in colic. She will just seem to be in a stupor for some hours. I do not work her hard at all, but on the other hand am exceptionally easy with her on this account. W. B. L.

A.—Formation of gas in the stomach, due to indigestion causes the symptoms described. Work the mare every day and when there is no work for her to do let her run out and have no grain feed. Do not feed her when hot and tired. Give the drinking water from a very large box to prevent bolting. Keep her bowels active. If the trouble continues mix together two parts of powdered wood charcoal and one part of bicarbonate of soda and of this mix a tablespoonful in each meal.

TUBERCULOSIS.—I butchered two hogs and their livers were three or four times larger than a year-old hog's liver should be. They were hard and when cut with a knife one could hardly cut it. I could break it, and it was full of hard lumps and was light brown in color. Their lungs were about one quarter as large as a hog of that age should be and they had hard white lumps in them. They were fed on meal and skim-milk to fatten them. When cut open their fat turned yellow. A piece of meat taken into the house had a decayed odor after a few hours. We did not use the meat. Would it have been fit to use? F. S. B.

A.—The postmortem lesions appear to be those of tuberculosis and the meat therefore would be unfit for use. The disease is contracted from milk or manure of affected cattle. Factory skim-milk often is to blame. Have your cows tested with tuberculin if that has not been done.

WARTS.—I had a sucking colt with about a peck of warts on him. Both ears hung down by the weight of them; his sheath had a bunch as big as a gallon pot. Finally I used common yellow axle grease, putting it on once a day. It cured him. C. F. A. K.

A.—As often advised here Castor oil, or goose grease freely applied will remove masses of small warts and we can well believe that axle grease might have a like effect.

MILK FEVER.—Please tell me what killed my two cows. One, a ten-year-old Jersey in perfect health, came fresh with her sixth calf. The birth was perfect and natural in every way and the cow all right. The second day I noticed that the cow refused food and seemed sick, became weak and could not walk or get up. She bloated and died a lingering death. Her bowels did not move after the calf was born. Her food consisted of pasturage and some Alfalfa hay with apple and potato peelings and beets. My other cow died in same manner when she came fresh with twin calves. MRS. A. P.

A.—The cows died of milk fever and might have been saved by simply milking clean and then inflating each quarter of the udder pumped in by means of a milking tube attached to a small rubber tube and bulb syringe. Milk fever may usually be prevented by cutting down the rich feed, keeping the bowels active and enforcing daily exercise for six weeks before calving.

LAMENESS.—I have a mare that is lame in her left hind leg. There is a knot below the joint that is as hard as bone. It seems to hurt her when she trots. Is it bone spavin and can you give a remedy? O. F.

A.—Lameness due to a bone spavin disappears temporarily when the horse is trotted for a short treatment. The best treatment would be to have the spavin and entire hock joint fired and blistered by a competent veterinarian, then keep the mare tied up short for six weeks. If you cannot have this done clip off the hair and blister the parts repeatedly while the mare is kept tied up.

SHRUNK IN MILK.—Three months ago I bought a cow two and one half years old. She was giving three quarts of milk per day. She freshened two weeks ago. At first did not give any milk. She gives three quarts now and eats heartily. She has a slight discharge from nose. The udder did not increase in size before the calf came. MRS. A. J. R.

A.—The cow should have been dried off for at least six weeks before calving. She may gradually increase in milk flow if you milk three times a day, massaging the udder thoroughly each time, and feed her generously on milk-making feed. She may have caught cold, but that should pass off soon.

INDIGESTION.—I have a horse that is twelve years old. He eats as much hay as would feed two, and seems eager to eat anything that he can reach. For grain he has mixed feed. He is very thin and anything he eats does not seem to do him any good. F. W. D.

A.—Bed the horse with shavings or sawdust and if necessary muzzle him between meals. Do not feed him over one pound of hay for each one hundred pounds of body weight as a day's ration if he works and only allow him a trifle more than that when idle. Feed a similar amount of whole oats. Make him work or exercise daily. Have his teeth put in order by a veterinarian; also have him clipped if he has a long, coarse coat of hair.

WARTS.—I have a calf six months old that has warts on the front shoulders and sides of its neck. What can I do to remove them? J. A. S.

A.—Twist off the large warts. Small ones will disappear after a time if rubbed daily with Castor oil, fresh goose grease, or axle grease.

ECZEMA.—I have a mare that has had eczema for four months. Can you give me a quick and simple remedy? W. W. S.

A.—We cannot prescribe unless you furnish a detailed description of the symptoms or condition present.

GARGET.—My cow is seven years old. Her fourth calf is two months old. She is a thoroughbred Black Jersey and has been giving four gallons of milk a day and making two pounds of butter. There are times when the udder is caked and appears to be sore. Her milk is lumpy or "ropy" and can hardly be strained. M. N.

A.—Garget is present and it is a disease of the udder for which the breed is in no way to blame. Milk three times a day and each night, where the udder is affected, rub in a mixture of one part each of turpentine and fluid extracts of belladonna leaves and pokeroot and five parts of lard or sweet oil. At such times also give a tablespoonful each of powdered saltpeter and pokeroot in the feed once daily.

PERIODIC OPHTHALMIA.—I have a seven-year-old mare, that, on four or five occasions has become partially blind in one eye. The eye becomes somewhat inflamed, runs a little, and has a milky color. The mare does not work, runs out a couple of hours each day. She has two teeth on her lower jaw, one on each side about an inch ahead of the grinders. I supposed they were the cause of the trouble. C. R. G.

A.—The veterinarian is right, the disease being periodic ophthalmia (moon blindness) and incurable, but the disease is not caused by "wolf" teeth, nor do such teeth ever affect the eyes in any way. The teeth described are not wolf teeth. We suspect that they are small tusks sometimes seen in mares, and always present in the mouth of a stallion or gelding. Blindness may be retarded by bathing the eyes daily and at time of attacks putting a few drops of a 15 per cent solution of argerol between the eyelids once a day.

RINGWORM.—I have a calf six months old, that eats heartily and appears in good health. The calf has scab spots back of his head and ears and around his eyes. Please give a remedy. F. H. W.

A.—Scrub each spot clean with soap and hot water for removal of all scabs or crusts. When dry rub in a little iodine ointment and repeat the application once daily for three or four days, then every other day.

WATERING EYE.—My year-old filly colt has one eye that runs water and pus. It seems to come up from the nose, when she throws up her head. She has wind in hock joints, though not as large as they were. W. M. A.

A.—The tear duct is blocked and it will be necessary to have a trained veterinarian open it by way of the opening in the nostril. The puffs in the hocks should be well hand-rubbed twice daily and after one month of such treatment should be lessened in size. then cover the joints with pine tar and turn the colt out daily for exercise.

FOUNDER.—I have a twelve-year-old mare that is lame in her hips. She eats heartily and runs on a pasture in summer and in a stalk pasture in the fall. She was all right until last spring. Her hind feet point in nearer her front feet. Her back humps up. Her front ankles swell. She can get up and down all right. L. C.

A.—The symptoms apparently indicate founder affecting both fore feet. If you cannot employ a veterinarian to make an examination, clip the hair from the hoof heads of both fore feet and blister them repeatedly, one at a time, until the lameness subsides or is greatly lessened.

ABNORMAL MILK.—I have a cow six years old that goes dry three or four weeks. Two months before she freshens the butter comes like coarse meal and will not gather. MRS. E. H. M.

A.—It will be neccessary to dry the cow off for six weeks or more before calving by putting her on a hay ration and gradually stopping the milking process. It is quite common for the milk to be strong or to have churning troubles in such cases.

STUNTED CALF.—I want your advice about a yearling that has something wrong with him. When he was seven or eight days old he got out of the lot and took a run of a mile or two and didn't come back for four or five days. When I.e came back he had sores where the brush had scratched him. They have healed. The calf isn't as large as an ordinary calf—is bony and doesn't take on flesh. Its hair is scanty. M. M. H.

A.—It will not pay you to expend money, time or food on this stunted yearling, nor can we tell you any certain method of making it develop normally. Very likely it is affected with tuberculosis which is incurable.

How I Succeeded With My Incubator

Those who keep hens or contemplate doing so will find profitable information in the experiences of some of our poultry-raising subscribers in the use of incubators as told by them in the following letters. These and other letters which we shall publish later were written in response to COMFORT'S offer of prizes, last June, for best articles on "How I Succeeded With My Incubator."

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

Incubator Put Her in Business

I purchased an incubator about twelve years ago. I had tried for three years prior to this time hatching chicks with hens and had had many trying experiences, some of which were: Losses of chicks from lice and mites hatched by the hens, spoiled eggs by biddies not staying on their nests just as they should and too often they would not set until too late in season for chicks to mature and feather good before cold weather came on.

My incubator did away with all of these troubles because I run it myself.

I have always had good hatches when eggs were fertile.

One time, about five years ago, I had a few more eggs incubating than I could think out places to take care of chicks so put a small ad. in a farm paper, because I really believed they would stand shipping if boxed just right better than eggs do. My surplus chicks were soon all sold and I refilled the incubators and these sold just as quickly as before. This seemed one way open for me to make a living for myself and two children so I mean to advertise more and buy more incubators until in 1915 I hatched and sold $3,500 worth and this year, 1916, I have sold $2,200 worth since the first of March.

My children and I do all but the heaviest work, that we hire done. We have 40 incubators and, as I wrote, 20 of them have eggs incubating and I have a fine flock of 400 Single Comb White Leghorn hens and 1,400 growing chicks from six weeks to three and one half months old. I think the incubator has been a great help to us, and I believe others will find good incubators just as great a help. I underscore the word good because to succeed you must have a good incubator that regulates perfectly.

CLARA COLWELL, Kansas.

A Good Incubator Is a Boon

We find a good incubator is one great factor in getting a profit from the farm flock. It requires a good brooder for best results yet with these two machines the number of chicks which can be hatched and successfully reared on the average farm is limited only by the time and desires of the owner.

The incubator enables one to set the very first eggs of the spring laying season where desirable. It enables us to get the bigger price in the earlier markets for the cockerels and puts the pullets in just right to make good all-winter layers. With the machine ready we need not wait for setting hens and can keep them laying right when the eggs are needed most.

We find it doesn't require nearly so much time to attend to a good incubator of two hundred and fifty egg capacity as is required to look after the number of hens on that number of eggs. That would be practically seventeen smaller size hens. Unruly hens will become dissatisfied and quit. Nests will be broken up and numbers of eggs broken. We may keep the sitters in a special room and keep each hen shut to herself only letting one or two off at a time into the feeding and watering pen yet this requires a great amount of time and needless bother in view of the labor-saving-machine method.

It doesn't take more than fifteen or twenty minutes each day to properly turn and air the eggs and fill the lamp. With a good self-regulating incubator this temperature item is a small concern.

We find a good incubator when properly regulated will hatch fully as big a percentage of eggs as the hen. The main point for early spring hatches we find is to get the eggs from the flock that starts laying in the spring on good range and feed. The hen that has been forced to lay all winter produces only mediocre chicks of questionable vitality.

The incubator chick is notably free from lice and mites since they have small chance for infection. We take the chicks direct from the machine to a brooder in a closed park away from the older flock where the mites have very small show. If any lice should show up they are easily killed by a spraying and dusting with some good louse destroyer.

Experience has shown us it is generally the best policy to follow closely the directions laid out by the manufacturer in operating any machine. Yet there are some points upon which all good and reliable machines must agree. Eggs should lie flat in the trays at all times and in all machines. We had a machine so constructed that the eggs remained tilted on their small ends throughout the period of incubation. We worked the trays over till the eggs could lie flat and the chicks were much stronger. Better hatches were secured.

By comparison of thermometers one can judge as to the working order of their register. When the old thermometer does not come up to specifications a new one is in order. One cannot afford to risk a good hatch for the price of a new register.

A good incubator is a boon to the farm poultry raiser as well as the professional.

W. L. HAISLEY, Ind.

Cleared $62.60 with Incubator

My first attempt with an incubator yielded 85 chicks from 100 eggs. Of these I raised 71. I took good care of them, always being sure they were not overcrowded or overheated. I feed four times daily for three weeks, afterwards three times. At the age of four months I sold 30 of them at 27½ cents, total $9.60. I had 41 pullets that began laying in November and continued throughout the entire winter almost from November 5 to February 2nd. I had gathered and sold 205 dozen at 30 cents, $61.50.

My expenses from first to last are as follows: Machine, $10; Brown Leghorn eggs, $2.50; oil about $1., feed, $2.50, $26 cost. Received $9.60 for young chickens sold, $61.50 for eggs and $17.50 for hens, total, $88.60, less $26.00 expense, leaving clear profit, $62.60.

Later hatches have been a little more successful due to experience. Chicks hatched by incubator are strong and vigorous, free from vermin, are less trouble to feed and tend, as they are all in one bunch, in short the incubator is a labor saver.

Directions must be followed to the letter, but it pays, as you can keep your hens laying and at the same time have fryers or early laying pullets when desired.

This is a mighty good thing about an incubator, it will set any time desired.

GERTRUDE ROBERTSON, La.

Wouldn't Take $100 for Incubator

I am living on a little farm of 54 acres, and for the past ten years had used hens for incubation. Last year my husband bought an old incubator for $6.00 and I would not take $100 for it if I could not get one in its place.

The incubator can be set any time in the year (I set mine the first of March). The incubator never gets lousy, never breaks the eggs, never leaves the nest after it has set for two weeks, never dies on the nest, and never eats the chicks just before they are hatched, like the old hens sometimes do.

If we follow the directions for the incubator we will have just as many chicks from an incubator as from that many good eggs set under hens. (I got 120 chicks from 125 good eggs).

Early hatched chicks bring better prices than late hatched chicks. This year I hatched and raised 360 chicks.

For brooder I used the lower part of old apple barrels as I find round brooders better than square ones. The round brooders have no corners where the chicks crowd and smother. I did not lose any chicks this year.

My figures this year are:

Eggs for hatching,	$12.50
Oil,	2.50
Feed,	19.40
Total cost,	$34.40
Sold 48 broilers,	$27.68
Sold 60 broilers,	29.10
107 chicks on hand, worth now,	40.00
125 chicks on hand, worth now,	35.00
	$131.78
Expense,	34.40
Clear,	97.38

I forgot to state what I feed my little chicks and how I keep them warm.

I place the brooder on top of the incubator, over the lamp. I have found if the little chicks are warm on their feet they are all right with only a thin covering. I never feed soaked feed, always dry. The first two days they get bread crumbled fine and water to drink. After two days old they get chick starter and boiled potatoes mashed fine and all the sour milk they will drink, after that they do not get any water before they are three or four weeks old.

I have taken COMFORT for eight years and it is the best paper I have, and I think I owe my "success with the incubator," to COMFORT.

Premium No. 4574

HERE IS an Alarm Clock that you can really depend upon—a clock that will keep perfect time all the time and having a patent shut-off alarm which will never fail to ring when you want it to ring if you will set the indicator on the hour and minute you desire to rise in the morning. Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this Bureau and of all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

E. R., Versailles, Ind.—You are like a great many other COMFORT readers who want to sell things in their own neighborhoods and don't know whether they should have a license or not—instead of asking your own local officials the simple question you write to an outsider a thousand miles or so away to learn what nobody knows but your own people. Ask your local officials.

Mrs. H. J. W., Catasauqua, Pa.—Match statistics for the whole world and separate countries are not to be had. We suppose about 437 billion matches are made in the United States, but we suggest that you write to the Sup't of U. S. Census, Washington, D. C., for details.

Mrs. G. W. S., Cordele, Ga.—Address letters to Sup't City Hospital, in any town or city that you want to know about and they will be delivered either to City or leading hospitals, where they exist. Put your address in corner of your envelopes for return if not delivered. We may say that not nearly as many towns in this country have hospitals as should have them. (2) Before going into raising sunflower seed write to Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., for information on the subject, including addresses of possible purchasers of your crop. What you need more than anything just now is knowledge.

Mrs. G. M. B., Ray, Okla.—We would not give you the address of an astrologer, no matter how many we had. The U. S. Post-office Department has put the ban on astrology and it cannot get through the mails. This is the 20th century, not the Dark Ages. (2) We have no personal knowledge of the manufacturing firms you mention.

Mrs. J. A., Norfolk, Va.—Easter Sunday, 1887, fell on April 10th.

A, Elkhorn, Iowa.—The Danish Consul at New York City is George Bech, 8 Bridge St.; at Omaha, Nebr., Otto Wolff. (2) May we suggest to you and to other COMFORT readers that the way to get in touch with great manufacturers who want agents is not to write to them for agencies without any knowledge or experience, but to take hold of such agencies as you already know about and work at them until you have acquired such knowledge and experience as will put you in touch. The big concerns want experienced agents and until you can go to them with experience you might write to their addresses forever and get nothing. Begin with the small concerns and work up to the big ones gradually. Long before you get to them you will have learned their addresses and all about them, if you have the stuff in you to make a successful agent. Inexperience is practically ignorance, and the ignorant have no show among the many well informed, or experienced.

L. M. M., Keewaydin, Pa.—For information about the position of government matrons and what are the necessary qualifications write to Secretary, Civil Service Commission, Washington, D. C. Most emphatically, respectable ladies fill such places and no others need apply.

U. S. S., Joplin, Mo.—The laws in the various states regulate carrying weapons, especially concealed weapons and firearms. In New York no one can have in his possession arms of any kind without a permit. Ask your city officials about local licenses of any kind.

B. C. D., Johnson City, Tenn.—Don't try to write photo-plays until you know enough about the business to know who are buying scenarios and what kind they want. You cannot expect to sell turnips to people who want only strawberries, can you?

Mrs. B. H. M., Tinsman, Ark.—The Knights and Ladies of Honor was founded in 1877 and had a membership last year of 65,855. Headquarters, Indianapolis, Ind. Secretary, Walter W. Connel, Indianapolis.

C. M., Mellen, Wis.—Before making corn whiskey, or studying how to make it, you will have to get several hundred dollars together to buy the necessary still and machinery, and apply to Uncle Sam for permit and payment of special tax. Maine, which is constitutionally opposed to corn and all other whiskey, is the last place where you should apply for information. Write to Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Washington, D. C. and get official information on the subject.

N. M., Doninphan, Mo.—For information about soldiers write to Secretary of War, Washington, D. C., giving full names, regiments, companies, etc. The Department keeps a record of all enlisted men and their movements.

Miss E. M., Minden City, Mich.—Though Thomas Jefferson is recognized as the founder of the Democratic party, the party did not take the name until Jackson was elected in 1824, Jefferson, Madison and Monroe being known as Republicans. The Democratic Presidents who followed Jackson are Van Buren, Polk, Pierce, Buchanan, Cleveland and Wilson. Since Jackson, Wilson is the only one to be reelected. (2) Ask home people about Michigan home rule.

Anxious, Netawaka, Kans.—For information about raising navy beans in large quantities and also for farm herbs, barks, roots and burrs, write to the Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C. No place in the world is equal to that for getting reliable information about just such matters as you want to know. (2) In localities where pedagogic talent is very scarce examinations are much more lax than in those where it is abundant, but we cannot direct you to the localities where it is scarce. You are more likely to find them in the South than in the West. Eastern Kentucky, for instance, might accommodate you. (3) We haven't the faintest idea what is the best coming occupation for young women who are not high school graduates. Efficiency is the cry nowadays and those who are not efficient must give way to those who are. In our opinion farming along special lines offers the best opportunities to young women not equipped with high school education. There are hundreds of women in this country on small farms doing beautifully with fruit, flowers, fancy vegetables, or poultry and along many other special lines. But these young women didn't have to be told what to do. They read farm papers, heard talks on farming, got government information on the subject and made their choice of what they felt they could best do and did it. We have too many people, young and old, who have to be shown. They lack initiative and unless they have that they never will amount to much more than hired hands always needing to be told what to do and how to do it.

W. M. H., Pineville, Fla.—Why write all the way from Florida to Maine to learn about things in your own neighborhood? Any teacher, or preacher, or other intelligent person in your town can tell you where your nearest circulating libraries are. We cannot, but we congratulate you upon your desire to get books to read. You will find them all right, if you want them enough.

Mrs. G. W. S., High Rock, Pa.—Both glass and aluminum may be melted.

H., Kirkland, Ill.—Regular colleges do not confer degrees for work done in correspondence schools unless the student has in addition to that or without it, such learning as would entitle him to a degree.

Carnation, Marion, Utah.—Beeswax may be bleached by machinery, but the simple plan is to cut into thin slices and expose it on a coarse cloth, fixed above the ground on posts, to the sun and weather, dampening it occasionally with soft water, if there is no dew or rain. It should be turned over frequently and will be bleached in four or five weeks. If it does not bleach through in that time, it should be melted and again exposed in thin slices to the sun and weather until it is as white as wanted.

Police, Newburg, N. Y.—If a young man in his own city doesn't know enough about how to get on the police force and must send five hundred miles away for information where there isn't any, he hasn't the stuff in him of which good policemen are made. Ask the Chief of the Newburg police what he thinks about it.

G. W. B., Island Pond, Vt.—For information about your state offices and officials write to Secretary of State, at the state capital. Other COMFORT inquirers please note.

Pauline, Albany, Ala.—Nay, nay, Pauline, you should not seek to become a screen actress. There are already as many of them looking for the same job as there are writers writing photo-plays and the market is disastrously overstocked. You may think you are a "movie star," but you are not. Really, you are not.

Mrs. L., Tolstoy, N. Dak.—To become a flour tester, or blender, requires not books of instruction, but actual practise in the mill and such positions are filled by persons who have been working in the mills along other lines until they have become conversant with that branch. In addition they have a special faculty, as tea and wine tasters have.

Broken-hearted, Etna, Nebr.—Red ink writing in a letter means that the writer has no other ink, or has very bad taste. It has nothing to do with broken hearts.

J. B., Hillsboro, Ill.—A boy born in this country and living here until he is twenty-one years of age becomes a citizen whether his father is a citizen or not. (2) In those states where women vote the voting age is twenty-one for them as it is for men.

F. W. S., Hereford, Texas.—There is no federal law against a man voting who has not paid his taxes in the state where he wishes to vote. State laws control in such matters.

Lulu, Boonton, N. J.—The word "Aloha" is Hawaiian and means "Love," but it is very generally used in salutation, greeting or parting.

J. J., Long Bottom, Ohio.—You are taking too glommy a view of the public school situation in Ohio. There may be individuals, or even remote sections, which are not getting full benefits, but taking the schools by the large, we may say that if every state in the Union had as good schools as Ohio, they would have reason to be thankful.

The Modern Farmer

or more will not buy such a heifer as that kind of calf may be made to develop into when old enough to breed or when springing.

The effort everywhere is to have cows produce a pound of butter fat a day as the minimum and such a minimum is going to be necessary where land, feed and help are high. Only by right breeding and judicious selection and feeding can such cows be produced and lucky is the man who manages to build up such a herd, keep it healthy and hand it down to posterity. Make it the invariable rule never to raise any animal that is not known to be from perfectly profitable stock on both sides of its pedigree or breeding.

Stimulating Milk Flow

We recently received a letter from a farmer who asks this peculiar question: "Is it true that the feeding of too early cut hay that has been heavily salted will fill the gutters with urine and at the same time increase the milk flow?"

To this we must answer that there is much truth in the allegation. The too early cut hay is liable to be moldy and moldy hay will be sure to increase the flow of urine. Salt has a like effect, first loosening the bowels. Such feed will even cause dangerous diabetes in the horse and also is objectionable and even dangerous for cows.

We must strongly object to the stimulation of milk flow by purposely irritating the excretory organs. The mammary glands (udder glands) are intended for milk secretion, not for excretion; but they are liable, in a measure, to join with the excretory glands when these are irritated so that diarrhea and diuresis (profuse flow of urine) may mean a like profuse flow of milk. Such milk cannot be considered wholesome. It will tend to cause summer complaint or other derangement of the bowels of infants drinking it and when mothers blame the stomach teeth for these often deadly ailments they should be looking into the source of the child's milk and may find the cause of disease there.

It is for this reason that condenseries refuse to accept milk from cows fed on wet distillery or brewery grains. They also reject milk from cows fed the refuse of vinegar factories, beet sugar plants or any feed, including sour or acid silage, which greatly influences excretion from the bowels and kidneys and incidentally the udder.

Let every man who feeds cows make it a ruling principle that the milk he markets shall be fit and wholesome food for his own little ones, then he will not be willing to stimulate manure and urine production with the hope of increasing milk flow. The idea is disgusting, revolting and deserving of general condemnation, and we believe the practise is contrary to the pure food laws.

The Questions and Answers constitute one of the most valuable features of this department and we urge our farmer subscribers to read all of them carefully each month, as you will find that they contain much useful information and advice on practical problems that are troubling you as well as those who have asked the questions. Cut them out and paste them into a scrapbook for future reference. This will save you the trouble of writing us and will avoid delay in getting your answer when you need advice on these same matters. We are glad to receive inquiries from our subscribers and to advise them on all matters pertaining to farming.

Questions and Answers

SAWDUST AS FERTILIZER.—Please tell me whether sawdust is a good fertilizer. Some say it sours the land. C. E. H., Keohonkson, N. Y.

A.—Hard wood sawdust is of some benefit on very heavy, sticky clay as it tends to open up the soil. Sand would be preferable, while sawdust may be used as bedding where plentiful, it would not pay to haul it and use as fertilizer alone, or for opening purposes. The ashes remaining after burning the sawdust would be more valuable, being rich in potash and other salts. Pine sawdust is unsuitable for use on land. Sawdust used as bedding absorbs and holds the liquid manure, which is the most valuable part, and to that extent is valuable as a fertilizer when used for bedding.

WHAT ABOUT SUNFLOWERS.—I am thinking of planting twenty or thirty acres to sunflowers and would like to know how they will do on sandy soil; what variety to grow; where to get the seed; how to plant and cultivate; how to harvest and cure; what the yield; how and where to market the crop; would it pay me to plant 20 or 30 acres? M. M., New Rome, Wis.

A.—We refer you to answers to similar inquiries in January COMFORT where you will find all your questions answered so far as possible to answer them. See also in this issue what we advise under heading "Start New Crops on a Small Scale." We repeat: Don't gamble by making a big plunge on a new and untried crop. Start on a very small scale and if results prove satisfactory spread out the next season.

ACTRESS TELLS SECRET.

A well known actress gives the following recipe for gray hair: To half pint of water add 1 oz. Bay Rum, a small box of Barbo Compound, and ¼ oz. of glycerine. Any druggist can put this up or you can mix it at home at very little cost. Full directions for making and use come in each box of Barbo Compound. It will gradually darken streaked, faded gray hair, and make it soft and glossy. It will not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy, and does not rub off.—Adv.

A Handsome Tray Cloth

20 x 26 Inches — Premium No. 7841 — For One Subscription

We call the above one of the handsomest designs in a tray-cloth we have yet seen to say nothing of its large size, which is 20 x 26 inches and yet in spite of its size it does not require an unusual amount of work to finish it. The stitches themselves are simple as it may be worked either in solid or eyelet embroidery with buttonhole edge. It looks the neatest when worked all in white, although one or more colors may be used if desired. This extra large, attractive tray-cloth comes stamped on pure white "Butcher cloth" which in reality is very fine linen finished cotton—a material which has the appearance of pure linen and will if anything give longer service. We will make you a present of this tray-cloth upon the terms of one of the following special offers.

Offer 7841A. For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25c we will send you this handsome tray-cloth free by parcel post prepaid.

This Dear Little Infant Doll Talks And Cries For Mama LIKE A REAL BABY!

Premium No. 7284

THIS is the very latest in talking dolls and without doubt the best one ever invented. You have probably heard the "so-called" talking dolls that have heretofore been sold in the stores and which don't talk at all but simply make a noise which is not like anything human—simply a "squeak" or a "squeal". Here is a doll however that speaks and says "Mama" so plainly that it actually startles everyone who hears it. No strings to pull. You simply press it gently in the back and the wonderfully life-like voice responds instantly. The vocal mechanism by which this doll imitates human speech completely fills its chubby body. The marvelous contrivance is thoroughly made and its distinct articulation of "Mama" is surprising, not to say bewildering to those who hear it. Therefore it is nothing like the ordinary crying or talking doll for the principle of reproducing a baby's voice in this new infant doll has been so very much improved that it hardly seems possible to add more and all are pleased with the results. Including dress and all this little infant measures 14 inches in length. The pretty white infant's dress and hood is trimmed with lace and handsome blue silk ribbon bows. She has blue eyes and a cute baby curl peeps out from beneath the hood in a truly life-like manner. This doll is unbreakable, the head being made of a special indestructible composition of a natural flesh-like color so that in appearance as well as in voice it more closely resembles a real baby than any doll made up to the present time. No matter how many dolls the children now have, they will surely be delighted with this doll which talks as if it were really alive and every mother who reads this offer should take advantage of it at once. We will send you this new talking infant doll exactly as described upon the terms of the following CLUB OFFER. For a club of four one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25c each or two three-year subscriptions at 50c each we will send you this talking infant doll free by parcel post prepaid. Premium No. 7284.

The Wrong Way Out

By Lou E. Sweeney

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

BETTY MOORE hung up the receiver and turned from the telephone. She stood for several moments absorbed in thought and then broke into bitter, scornful speech, though there was none near to hear her—or perhaps, for that very reason.

"I give wedding presents," she cried bitterly, "how can a person who never has a cent that she can call her own, give presents! It is not right. How can men be so cruelly thoughtless, so utterly selfish?" and, sinking into a chair, Betty gave herself up to the luxury of being perfectly miserable.

By and by, the nine o'clock school bell rang, and she remembered that not one of her household tasks had yet been touched. Mechanically she went about her work, her mind running back over the five years of her married life. Before her marriage, she had taught in the village school. Merry, sweet-tempered, and generous, she was loved alike by old and young. When the old people had predicted that John Moore would not make her happy, the young folks had scoffed at the idea. Moore was all right, they said—a little stern, slightly inclined to be exacting, somewhat "close" with his money—but a good fellow, just the same.

The Moores lived in a little house in the edge of the village. Betty did all her own work and cared for her two little girls. John provided well for his family—according to his own ideas. He bought what he thought they needed, and that was all. Betty's cheeks burned afresh with resentment, as she remembered how he invariably answered whenever she expressed a wish to buy anything. "Very well, get it if you need it," he always said. It was not that she wanted to be extravagant, she told herself, but she wanted him to show that he was willing for her to spend a little now and then, and not care how she spent it.

Her thoughts still ran on. She recalled the many, many humiliating experiences she had suffered because of her lack of pocket money. Often she was asked to subscribe to some charity fund, but, of course, had to refuse. How could she do otherwise? She had no money of her own, and she did not feel free to give John's money. Occasionally, there was a collection taken up in her presence, for some good purpose or other, and she had to sit with flushed face and downcast eyes as the plate passed her. She knew that people wondered at her—perhaps they pitied her! It was all the more irksome, for the reason that, in her girlhood, she had given freely to every good cause; she had had her own money then.

Betty thought of the last time that she had asked her husband for money—two years ago, it was. She had wanted to do some Christmas shopping and, feeling in a holiday mood, had gaily demanded the "wherewithal" for her enterprise. She turned weak and faint at the very memory of the agony of pain which had shot through her heart, as he had gruffly asked: "How much do you want?"

She remembered how she had forced herself to answer indifferently, "Oh, nothing; it doesn't matter," and had then blindly stumbled to her own room, to sob her heart out in silent misery, while John had gone on with his reading, wholly unconscious of the hurt in her heart.

Since that day, she had never asked him for money; she simply could not. He had hurt her too sorely for forgetfulness. Gradually, she had dropped out of things. It was easier to stay at home than it was to go and suffer some humiliation on account of her penniless condition. She even grew so morbid that she fancied that John did not care to buy her necessary clothing, so she dressed shabbily, going without many, many things that she needed. And, man-like John never noticed that her clothes were old-fashioned and much worn.

And thus the years passed. Betty's heart was full of bitterness toward her husband. At times, she tried to root out this feeling; for, she knew that no wife should feel like that toward her husband, but at the very moment of success, some thoughtlessly selfish deed on his part would arouse all the old animosity, and there was the same hard battle to be fought again. She rigidly performed all wifely duties, but it was from a sense of duty, not love. If her husband sometimes wondered at the change which had come over his wife—for Betty had become strangely cold and silent—he set it down to woman-nature and never dreamed that he was in fault.

Betty grew thin and ill from overwork, but no word of complaint passed her lips. One evening John found her unconscious on the library floor. Thoroughly frightened, he placed her on the couch and began bathing her face and chafing her cold hands.

After a time, Betty opened her eyes and looked at him.

John softly stroked the hand he held, while gently urging his wife to take better care of herself for his sake.

Betty listened in silence for a time. Suddenly, she threw off his hand, sprang to her feet, and began pacing the floor. At length, she faced him and the pent-up bitterness of the past years poured in torrents from her lips. All her wretchedness—the unbearable humiliation of her proud spirit—was made known to him.

John sat aghast. He had never dreamed of anything like that. His heart ached for her; he really loved his wife and had not meant to be unkind. He had only been careless—as many another man has been.

"I am neither a slave nor a child," Betty cried, "that I must humbly beg for every cent that I wish to spend. A married woman has some rights. I work as hard as you do. The difference is, you get paid for your work, while I receive nothing for mine. It is exceedingly hard never to have a nickel you can call your own—especially, if you have been accustomed to earning your own money and spending it as you pleased. It is humiliating beyond expression, to be called on in public to give to some good work, and be compelled to refuse because you have no money. I have gone without everything that I wanted and many things that I needed, simply because I could not bring myself to ask you to buy them for me."

Her voice broke and she paused for a moment, but threw out her hand with a gesture commanding silence, when John would have made eager reply.

"I know that I should not feel like this. I tried not to care. I made excuses for you. I fought desperately for our happiness. Time and again, I resolved that I would not become discontented, but it was of no use and, when I realized this, I made up my mind that I would find some work which I could do quietly in my own home. I thought that would be good for my mind—and my purse. It has been very hard and I have not yet succeeded, but I will," she ended fiercely.

John went up to Betty; but when he would have taken her in his arms and comforted her, she shrank from him and turned to mount the stairs. Midway up, she wavered and fell, rolling to the very bottom step.

Crushed with misery and alarm, John sprang to his wife's side. Lifting her tenderly, he carried her to her room and summoned a physician.

Day and night, doctor and nurse stood over Betty, stubbornly fighting for her life. She was very dear to them; for, both had known and loved her from babyhood. John wandered about the house, too anxious and unhappy to settle down anywhere. Miserable away from Betty, he could not bear to see her suffer and hear her delirious raving. His face burned as he listened to her unconscious betrayal of those years of suffering and unhappiness.

After days of hovering in the borderland between life and death, Betty's wandering spirit came slowly back to earthly cares. There came a day when she was able to sit in an easy chair by the window. Sitting there, she took a mental review of the past few years—and she feared that they had been wasted. Somehow, nothing mattered now, but that she was alive and had her babies and husband. "What a fool I've been," she thought, "just to be alive is joy."

There was a knock at the door and her husband came in. Dropping to his knees by her side, he buried his face in her lap. Presently Betty became aware that he was murmuring brokenly, terms of endearment, words of penitence, and promises for the future, all hopelessly jumbled together.

Gently stroking the bowed dark hair, she whispered unsteadily:

"We'll begin again, dear; I, too, was in fault."

"Wisconsin Farmer" an article written by the editor, James M. Pierce, on the subject which solved the problem for me. Mr. Pierce said, "I believe every man, whatever his business may be, should discuss his business affairs with his wife. He should tell her every detail of his affairs down to the smallest item, make her his partner in every way. I believe that every woman should consult her husband in every undertaking, from the buying of household conveniences to the moral principles which she tries to instil into her children's minds. In no other way can married life be a success."

My husband and I each agreed that on those very principles was our home built and maintained. I realize that there are couples who perhaps had not the chance that we have had as we were both married before and neither first marriage was happy, and another thing, I was thirty years old and my husband eleven years my senior when we were married.

Too many young people enter the marriage state without sufficient thought. Little they think of how serious a step they are taking. They simply see the romantic side and follow their passionate impulse. For such people I can see little help as I have never yet seen a couple who after quarreling and wrangling for years could ever bring themselves to give each other credit for even common sense. My advice to those contemplating matrimony is look well before taking the step and once it is taken don't look back. There are many sacrifices ahead of both. Pray for strength to meet them cheerfully.

Another marriage which is almost bound to prove a failure is a marriage between a Prostestant and a Catholic.

Hoping this may do someone a little good, I remain, with best wishes to all, MARGARET MAGEE.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

In reading my last COMFORT I see that the subscribers have not been very prompt in giving assistance to the fund for Uncle Charlie's Home, but I just know they nearly all will, but, like myself, have put off attending to the matter from day to day, until before we realize it, a whole month has passed. But this very day I am going to get my letter ready and when I go to town (I live in the country) will send him money order for one dollar. I have all four of his books and enjoy them very much. He is certainly one of God's noble men.

With best wishes for dear old COMFORT (have been a subscriber for ten years) and a heartfelt prayer for Uncle Charlie, MRS. C. M. ANDREWS.

LOUISVILLE, R. R. 4, MISS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been reading COMFORT ever since the days of Aunt Minerva, and always expect to take it. When it comes, my mother, sister and I always see which can get it first. The stories are so good, Uncle Charlie's talks and the sisters' letters are so interesting that anyone who does not take it cannot realize all the good things they are missing.

I am an invalid and want to speak a few words on invalidism in general. A few months ago I underwent a serious surgical operation and was in the hospital nearly four weeks and I know how to appreciate a smile, and a kind word as much as anyone on earth and I notice how sweet and pleasant some are and how thoughtless and selfish others can be. The most welcome visitor to a sick room is the one who comes in with something cheerful and bright to relate, with a smile of sympathy that we know is real. Sometimes some thoughtless person comes in telling about someone being killed, or injured or sick or dead. And a sick person's thoughts feed upon what he hears. If something good, good thoughts are on their mind; if something horrible and fearsome, again such is on the mind. Everyone likes to remember a beautiful face, a beautiful voice or some kind act. Nothing is truer than that beautiful thoughts shine in one's face.

I enjoy the letters from the sisters and would appreciate a personal letter from any of them ever so much.

I admire fancy work and enjoy doing it. I would like quilt pieces and thread from those who have them to spare for I like to do something to pass away the time in my lonely shut-in life.

With much love to all, LUDIE GRIFFIN.

TEXAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have been a subscriber for some time and since reading Mrs. Martin's letter on the divorce question I have decided to send my opinion. I am unable to see a crime in divorce. Those who oppose divorce argue that it is opposed to the will of God. They cite that part of the scripture which says, "Whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder." Now I don't think it takes a couple long to find out that God had nothing to do with their marriage. Does anyone believe that the Lord joins together those persons who marry for social reasons or for money? Marriage is made by love alone. If love does not join husband and wife there is no marriage—merely a mistake. What love hath joined together man cannot put asunder.

I enjoy reading the sisters' letters so much.

Respectfully, MRS. C. L.

MORGANTOWN, IND.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND ALL:

I have taken COMFORT for a long time and have always read the sisters' letters with interest. After reading Georgie's letter in December COMFORT have decided to write.

My dear sister Georgie, how can you choose city life in preference to country life for your children? We lived in the city six years and have been living in the country five years, and there isn't enough money to hire me to take my children back to the city to live now, much less after they get to be the age of yours. We have three children, aged six, eight and ten; the oldest a blue-eyed, fair-haired boy and two dark-eyed girls with hair the color of their eyes. I cannot see that country schools are inferior to city schools, and by comparing my children's reports with those of children who go to city schools our children are as far along in school, if not farther, than children their age who go to city schools. And how can a child, or anyone else, see too much of Nature? Is not that what God intended them to see? If there had been a better and wiser way to have constructed nature God would surely have used it, since all plans were open to Him. We cannot doubt but that He chose the wisest way. Our children have never yet seen the things of which you speak. If they did and asked me questions concerning what they saw I would tell them the truth. They already know that every living thing must have two parents. I have taught them that. They should know the truth about such matters, but should be instructed in a way not to excite anything but purity in their minds. They should be taught that life and parentage is sacred. I think it is all wrong for parents to bring children up without teaching them the meaning of parentage and the origin of life. All children, if they are not idiots or of unsound mind, ponder these questions in their minds. Where did we come from? We know where chickens and birds come from, how seeds germinate and sprout plants, but how and where do little calves, lambs and children come from? When your children come to you, asking you these questions, innocently and confidently, expecting you to tell them the tuth, for how could they expect anything but the truth from their own parents, can you turn them away with an indirect answer and leave them to find out the truth from someone else? The other person may not tell them in a way that you would like for them to hear it, and imagine the bitterness your child would feel toward you when he found that his mother had told him a lie and could not be trusted. That is why children are inclined to lie; it is not born in them, but rather is taught them from infancy.

I do not know which is healthier, the country or town, although I should think contagious diseases would spread faster in town on account of more people coming in contact with each other, and then I should think that the more space one has to breathe in the purer the air is. Any child should be comparatively healthy if the parents are healthy in the first place, and they are properly cared for; bathed regularly and allowed to sleep by themselves in well-ventilated rooms, and given proper food to eat. People that are not perfectly healthy should not bring children into the world. In the first place they should not marry. Why should little innocent children be brought into the world to suffer? I believe in Dr. J. A. Houser's doctrine, "Fewer children and better."

We are a happy country family, and I love my home and neighbors. I think anyone who has the will to, can be happy in any place, although I could be much happier in the country than in the city, for in the city I would always be afraid of the future for my children.

Uncle Charlie's talk in November COMFORT was very good and is perfectly true, and it is enough to show us the dangers of city life.

With love and best wishes for every one, I remain, Your constant friend, MRS. S. ACKERMAN, MISS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I am a stranger to the sisters, yet, not one of you seems like a stranger to me. I have been for many

In order to meet the demand for information made by COMFORT subscribers on the kindred subjects of Etiquette and Personal Appearance, this column will be devoted to them, and all questions will be answered, but no inquirer shall ask more than two questions each month. We would suggest to readers to cut this column out and paste it in a scrap book. Address letters to Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Kittycol, Gonzales, Texas.—When a lady's escort asks her to select a box of candy, she should not ask the clerk the price, but she should select a medium-sized box so as not to strain the generosity of her escort. She should thank him for it on the spot. When else could she thank him better?

Q. T., Raleigh, N. C.—It may be nice enough and proper enough to ride a motorcycle with a young man you have been going with, but we think it is much safer not to, unless he has a side-car. A lady on a motorcycle with a man doesn't look very nice, either. (2) You may do as you please about assisting the young man to put on his overcoat. They all like to have the girls help them that way.

F. L., Remus, Mich.—If the escort who took the lady to the party does not object to her going home with a different one, etiquette will not object. To do so without his consent would be worse than etiquette and no lady would do it. Unless the party were over by ten o'clock the escort should not go into the house at all, except in the case of a regular caller who usually remained quite late, or the lady had prepared a small feast for her escort, as is sometimes done after evening entertainments, outside.

Blonde, Dahinda, Ill.—A very little society, so called, and the association of young men should be indulged in by a girl of any age while she is at school. A little is not objectionable, if of the best, but a girl who is giving proper attention to her studies can have very little time for social divertisements. When she is through school there will be time enough for society and beaus. (2) When you are older and are better acquainted with men and women you will be more careful in the selection of what you call true friends and you will not be so disappointed in them. Your experience with your present and previous selections is teaching you that now. You can find plenty of true friends, who are really true, but you can't pick them up everywhere and you cannot make the right selection without proper care.

Black Eyes and Brown, Bolivar, La.—Don't believe any man who tells you he will quit drinking on condition of something you may do for him, whatever it is. One time in a thousand maybe, he can be believed and you never can tell which time that is until it is too late. (2) It may not be wrong for two girls to walk three miles at night to a party with two young men, but it is wretchedly bad manners for two young men to ask two girls to walk that far. They should not go unless they could afford a conveyance. (3) Unless there is some very good reason for it the gentleman should not pay the lady's way on the train. If she is with him by invitation, he should pay. (4) A very great many good men drink, but never get drunk, yet they would be better men if they did not drink. Alcohol is one of the finest things in the world to let alone.

Unhappy, Baw Island, Alta, Can.—For the children's sake you must bear with the father, at the same time your duty to them and to yourself does not compel you to submit to indignities from the father and if you will assert your rights as a wife and mother and insist upon his recognizing and respecting them, we believe he will realize that he is not fair with you and will improve in his conduct. Most husbands have to be taught by their wives how to be the right kind of husbands and it is for you to teach this one.

M. O., Dazey, N. Dak.—A finger bowl should be used by dipping the fingers daintily into it and cleansing them and also the lips, using the serviette afterwards. Some people use a finger-bowl as though it were a wash-basin, which is very bad form. (2) If a friend on whom you are calling asks you to stay to dinner, or other meal, you accept with thanks—if you accept—and when you leave you should say how pleasant a time you had and how nice of her to ask you, or something like that by way of expressing your appreciation. Don't overdo it.

Noname, Lost Creek, W. Va.—Let the girl alone till you get out of school. If she has refused to answer any one of your four letters you should take it as a quadruple sign that she doesn't want to write to you or hear from you. You know that she is afraid of her parents and that they object to you and why do you want to make things any more disagreeable for her? Have a heart, young man, and also have some sense. N. B. Before you leave high school you should take a special course in letter writing. No wonder the girl didn't like your letters.

Soldier's Girl, Detroit, Mich.—As between a soldier you know nothing about and a civilian whom you know nothing about, the preference would be for the soldier because he must have some character and respectability or he could not be a soldier. At least, in the regular army. The civilian might be an ex-convict or something of that sort. But why become engaged to a man of any kind whom you know nothing about? Do you think such ignorance is a good foundation for a happy married life?

Chum, Lenoir, N. C.—No matter how young a married woman is she is no longer in the girl class and she must dress and deport herself as a mature woman. (2) What a married woman should say when any one wishes her joy depends upon how she feels about it. The usual response is "Thank you, very much."

F. D., Crookston, Minn.—Ordinarily boys and girls in school do not wait upon etiquette to become acquainted and it is just as well that they do not. But neither should presume upon this to act otherwise than as ladies and gentlemen. (2) You may make any pleasant answer you please to: "I am glad I met you." The common reply, which is very common, is: "The pleasure is mine."

Va. Girl, Evington, Va.—The attendants—not "waiters"—at a wedding group themselves at the sides of the bride and groom, and a little to the rear, or they may arrange themselves according to the space they have before the officiating clergyman. They may precede or follow the couple, going to their respective sides before the altar. At supper they may take their places according to their rank, the highest being next to the bride, or better, they should sit so that ladies and gentlemen alternate.

Two and One, Mt. View, Va.—It is proper enough for a lady to wear a ring a gentleman loans her, but she will certainly not do it if she knows it belongs to another lady. (3) Third cousins are really no kin and they should be treated as strangers in kissing. (3) A gentleman may call on a lady, even though she likes another gentleman better. She can't like everybody alike, can she?

Olive, Pleasant Valley, N. J.—It depends upon how far past forty a woman is before she becomes too unattractive to marry, and some never do, especially if they are rich and some young man wants their money. Many girls who are neither good looking or attractive in their youth develop into charming women when they are forty and after. (2) There is no time limit in the matter of acquaintance before becoming engaged. No girl, however, should become engaged to a man whom she had known only a few months. A year's acquaintance is none too long and even then marriage develops many qualities, not always desirable, which had not been previously suspected.

Blossom, Maben, Miss.—About the only thing a lady can do, without creating a disturbance, when a caller wants to put his hands on her, when she sits near him, is to leave him and sit at a distance. If he persists after that, she can walk out of the room and leave him there to get away as best he can. A lady should not permit a man of that type—and there are plenty of them—to call on her, or ever see her alone. (2) Why a gentleman, who is always polite to a lady when meeting her anywhere, and may be even attentive for an afternoon or evening, does not call on her, or seek to extend his acquaintance with her, is something that etiquette cannot determine. You will have to ask him. He may have a reason, or he may be merely careless about calling. But the lady shouldn't worry about it.

Jim, Flowery Branch, Ga.—If a young lady of twenty finds a boy of eighteen worth her while it is quite proper for him to go with her. Most girls of twenty, however, prefer more seasoned timber. An eighteen-year-old boy is about the greenest thing that grows in the garden of girls. (2) Third cousins may legally marry if they want to.

Ignorant, La Follette, Tenn.—Card etiquette is a much more complicated matter in city society than it is in the society of smaller communities. It takes practise to learn it in the city, but in the country, a caller need only leave her card when she calls. If there are visitors at the house where she calls she may also leave a card for each visitor, though this is not always done. It is a sensible thing to do, though, because it identifies the caller to the visitor and she may take the card home with her for future reference. If the lady is accompanied by her husband, or her grown son, the men's cards should be left. So with one or more daughters. Usually in smaller communities everybody knows everybody else so well that these formalities are not very strictly observed and no great social harm seems to result from the breach of observance. Cards are not usually left when the person called on is at home, though if a servant let the caller in, a card is given to be taken to the person called on.

Cultivation of Golden Seal

By C. B. Irvine

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

AN advertiser who has the seed and and plants for sale breathes hope and encouragement in every line when he says "Golden seal is one of the most important drug plants in the world, and for the last sixty years it has steadily gained in price until now it is a sublime wealth producer. The shade from the north side of your house can be coined into money by planting golden seal seed." His words were so optimistic that inquiry was made, with the resultant discovery that golden seal farmers are the real little landers. They seemingly have Bolton Hall and his three acres and independence backed off the map. The seed men will tell you that this same golden seal is one of the greatest money makers of which they have any knowledge, when extent of area, amount of capital invested and labor necessary are taken into consideration. A few square feet of ground are said to insure the grower a living after he is once started and the plants become seed bearing. They say your neighbors and friends will all want to go into the business after they see your garden and watch you reap a harvest of dollars selling seeds while the roots are maturing.

Golden seal (hydrastis canadensis) is better known as yellow root, orange root, Indian dye, yellow eye and jaundice root. It is a small herbaceous perennial plant with a thick, fleshy rhizome from which extend in all directions long fibrous rootlets. It has a single stem from six to twelve inches in length, crowned by two unequal leaves. A small flower appears at the base of the upper leaf. The fruit in size and color resembles a raspberry, but is not edible. Its natural home is in the moist, rich woodland. The root is the portion most extensively used in medicine, but during recent years the demand has been such that the stem and top are now utilized. As early as 1860 the United States pharmacopoeia recognized its value, which had from earliest days been appreciated by the aborigines. It is much used in the cases of dyspepsia and affections requiring tonic treatment.

The Year Book of the Department of Agriculture for 1912 made the statement that it has been shown that many valuable drug and related crops can be grown in favorable regions throughout the country, and added that "the culture of golden seal has been successfully established." In a previous article on the same subject the same authority stated that the demand of the United States for medicinal substances of plant origin includes products drawn from wildly separated parts of the earth. Many plants growing either as weeds or in an otherwise uncultivated state are made use of in large quantities, and in some instances have become subjects of foreign demand. This steady call has gradually increased until the number of tons of crude drugs gathered in the different parts of the country is enormous. In certain sections of the country there is, as a result, a great diminution in the quantity of the higher priced products collected. In some cases plants which were formerly abundant and apparently exhaustless in quantity are today not to be found. This difficulty has been greatly increased by the cutting of the forests, thereby removing the conditions necessary to the growth of large parts of the flora of the region. Thus the stock of native drug products has decreased from year to year, with the result that prices paid to collectors have steadily risen. "A shortage has already become keenly felt," says the bulletin, "in the case of golden seal and a number of other relatively rare drug plants, and this shortage is certain to continue with increasing demand and to affect a larger number of products until the last available wild stock is in the drug-dealer's hands." But one remedy is suggested for this situation. The rare native drug plants must be brought under cultivation. The author of the bulletin says the necessity for cultivation seems to be near at hand, and cites the case of the golden seal as typical. The same authority says the price of this staple has steadily risen until it would seem that the growing of golden seal is worthy of a trial as a possible agricultural resource of limited scope.

Eighteen years ago dry golden seal roots were worth 18c per pound. The Agricultural Year Book for 1903 quoted them at 75c per pound in the wholesale market—and the drug difficult to obtain even at that price. Last year a grower sold his crop at $4 per pound and a few months later saw the quotations advance to $4.75. These last figures seem rather high, although it is the statement of the grower and is so given, without verification.

Rich, loose garden soil made to resemble as closely as possible that seen in deciduous forests, is required for golden seal. The growth would be stimulated by an abundance of decayed vegetable matter. It has been demonstrated that roots obtained by division will, when allowed to grow, reach a size suitable for harvesting and drying in about three years. It would seem that the cultivation of golden seal is still in its infancy, with price advancing, and these facts have been given due consideration by the Department of Agriculture, which sounds a note of warning in giving the advice to the prospective drug grower to be cautious.

Melody

For years rose growers have tried to produce a genuinely yellow rose, and when this Irish beauty was introduced, it was hailed with delight for it represented a new color in its class and has now become the greatest of all yellow roses for the home planter. It grows to perfection in any ordinary garden soil in all localities and from the time it is planted in the early spring, it bears continuously great numbers of lovely flowers of immense size, which stand out well from the plant, giving it a regal appearance and stamping it as the most extraordinary rose of its color. The color is a lovely shade of yellow, deepening to apricot in the center; in fact, it is a rose of sterling merit, which has proved hardy in all localities.

Frau Karl Druschi

This brilliant rose is renowned as the best snow-white rose ever produced. The foliage is heavy and of rich texture; but the glory of this plant, is its magnificent flowers, huge in size and produced with the greatest freedom on long stiff stems. A single plant will produce hundreds of bloomers, which are full, very deep and double. The color is marvelously white, positively without a suggestion of any tint or shade of color. The fragrance is exquisite; in short this glorious Rose seems to have been endowed with all the charms and grace of the entire rose family.

Maiden's Blush

A beautiful rose for bedding or decorated purposes just recently introduced. It is very vigorous and healthy, hardy enough to withstand all climates and quickly forming a handsome shapely bush the first season planted. It will thrive in most any soil or situation, clothing itself with beautiful ornamental foliage and having the vitality necessary to produce the handsome double flowers all through the season. Everyone exclaims over its exquisite beauty and after having seen it in bloom, we can well appreciate their enthusiasm. The delicate blendings of colors is almost impossible to describe, rose tints in the center of the flower gradually shading off into pale blush and creamy white.

Etoile De France

This rose has been selected from the almost unlimited number of hardy red roses, because it seems the acme of perfection. The bush grows upright, covered with beautiful, bronzy, green foliage, which is not subject to insect attack. The growth is so luxuriant and lusty that great masses of beautiful crimson roses are borne all summer. This is one of the finest of all garden roses.

Radiance

This wonderful new everblooming rose is one of the most beautiful varieties ever introduced. We want every lover of beautiful roses to plant Radiance for there is no other like it, either in color, growth, or beauty. It is the ideal garden rose, thriving in practically any soil under the most adverse conditions to a perfection seen in no other rose. The splendid flowers are produced in amazing profusion. They are immense in size, and the color is a beautiful blending of shades of carmine rose with opal and coppery reflections, extremely brilliant in effect, exquisitely beautiful but most difficult to describe. Radiance is the premier garden rose of today, and its numerous charms will delight you.

Red Dorothy Perkins

This is the most valuable addition to the popular class of Rambler roses ever produced. Its magnificent foliage is fine, dark and glossy, remaining intact to unseasonable weather and withstanding all diseases. This quality alone assures an ornamental climber which is nearly evergreen and its graceful pendulous habit will place it first among pillar roses. The marvelous production of bloom is really sensational; it is produced in great clusters; each individual rose being perfect in form and very double, the color being deep intense scarlet which retains its vivid brilliancy as long as the flower lasts.

A Corner for Boys

By Uncle John

HELLO boys. how does this month find you? It is the shortest of the year but we dare not sneer at it, because it is richer in great days than any other, at least to Americans. Can you enumerate them. St. Valentine's and the anniversary of the Maine disaster. There is an analogy between the importance of this pigmy month and the importance of your life, which you may, at this time, consider of little moment to the world at large. The prizes do not all go to those who are big and brawny by nature. It is the hard worker and the one with persevering spirit that wins out in the end. When discouraging thoughts try to steal into your consciousness think of the little month that virtually laughs at the others because her children have led the world so far ahead. Your thoughts are your children and your thoughts will have value just as soon as you transmute them into action.

Snow Block Building

Here's a brand new way of building with snow. With the simple mould shown in Fig. 2 we form it into bricks and with these we build walls, using wet snow for mortar and a pointed shingle for a trowel. Fig. 2 is a side view of the mould. The box "b" is made of one-inch boards and has pegs on the bottom edges, as shown, which fit into holes on the baseboard. To make a brick, fill "b" with snow and scrape it off level on top and then press "a" into it by standing on "c." Lift "b" straight up and brick will drop out. They may be used immediately or left over night to freeze hard. The inside walls of the box must be kept greased and the inner space should be a trifle larger at the base to allow for easy removal of block. To make a gable roof, the ridgepole must be supported at the ends with uprights like "f." When the slant boards "g" are on they may be covered with snow. Fig. 3 is a picture of a trowel made of a shingle, a spool and a piece of broom handle held together with a single stove bolt. The bolt head is countersunk into the face of the trowel. With this outfit and plenty of snow your supply of builing blocks will never run out.

Covered Sled

This picture suggests a way to make a limousine covering for your sled. It is six inches shorter than the runners and extended six inches over each side of the latter, as in Fig. 6. The making of the box is too simple to waste time explaining. The rough work might be covered with canvas and moulding strips nailed along all edges. This will make your finished article quite as neat as Fig. 1. The top section is hinged on and swings, as shown in Fig. 2. A side view, with the position of hinge shown is marked "a." Fig. 3 shows the hinge. "h," set into the wood its own depth or thickness, and the moulding strips "m." Fig. 5 shows part of the lower section with a back rest that may be made of a board padded with excelsior or hair and covered with cloth. Fig. 4 shows how the ventilator in the front works. It is hinged at the top and a bracket piece "B" is screwed to the inside of each end, a little below center. A metal lever piece, ten inches long, two inches wide, one sixteenth inch thick, with a slot one quarter inch wide and five inches long in the center of the lower part, is used to hold it open. The round-headed screw that goes through the slot in the lever bears on it hard enough to hold the ventilator open, and of course it may be screwed a little tighter at any time. A coin or the back of a knife blade will do for a screw-driver The glass in the sides and front make the box more comfortable to the person riding. The sled is ideal for your little brother or sister.

LIMOUSINE BABY SLED.

Skate Sharpening Tool

It is very difficult to sharpen skates properly without some kind of a guide to hold the file rigid and level. In the accompanying sketch, I have attempted to show a home-made file holder, which I have used with great success and which,

DEVICE FOR SHARPENING SKATES.

I believe, any boy of average mechanical ability can make for himself. Fig. 1 is a view of the tool in use. It is pushed back and forth with firm, even strokes, while the skate is held in a vise. The block, "b," Fig. 2, is three quarters of an inch thick, three inches wide, six inches long and has a groove running lengthwise in the center one inch wide and one eighth inch deep. The long sides of the groove may be sawed to the proper depth and the intervening strip shaved out with a chisel. Make the space between the two blocks "a" just wide enough for your skate to fit in snugly. Use hard wood and assemble the parts, as shown in Fig. 3. Each screw is one and one quarter inches long and fits into a hole already bored. The thumb screws. Fig. 5. when turned to the right, press against the file and hold it solid. Fig. 5 is an end view of the sharpener, with a curved file in the groove. This is used to finish the sharpening process and gives a slightly concave surface to the skate runner. The latter is very desirable when the ice is smooth and glary.

Lincoln's Wit

Abraham Lincoln was noted for his wit and resourcefulness. On many occasions it served to extricate him from embarrassing situations but probably never more palpably than during the Black Hawk war. Lincoln had been chosen captain of a volunteer company by his townsmen and with his nondescript band was marching to join the regular troops at the state capital. He did not know much about military tactics, and when his men, marching four abreast, came to a high stone fence with a gate only a foot wide, he could not, for the life of him, think of the proper order to give, to get them through it single file. "Halt," he cried, endeavoring to gain time, then a bright thought came to his rescue and he drawled, "This company is dismissed for one minute. When you form ranks again, please do so on the other side of that fence."

Puzzle

Write down the words represented by the pictures and rearrange the letters in the numerical order given by the figures under each. You will then have an expression or sentiment, uttered by a famous American, whose anniversary comes in February.

Riddles

Why can't a man shave with a cake of yeast or a wagon jack?

Because neither one is the right kind of a raiser (razor).

What is the difference between a prophet and a boy giving directions to a lost quartet?

One foretells, the other tells four.

Why is a man with a ten-year-old derby like George Washington?

Because he has his little hatchet (hat yet.)

Why is the forest lonesome in the springtime?

Because the trees are making boughs (bows) and getting ready to leave.

This is all the space I can allow you this time. I hope you will find the articles of interest and that, at least one of the plans, will meet with your approval. The COMFORT family is so large and the climate and environment of my readers so diversified that I cannot make all the ideas fit one particular section of the country. To please the largest number is my aim and I am willing, at all times, to listen to the friendly advice of correspondents. Indoor Game

The "Postman" game is a merry pastime for a mixed gathering of young folks. It may be played as a social entertainment or at a school party. A cardboard box with a slot in the top cover is placed on the table and the players are provided with post-cards or sheets of paper. Upon them they write humorous messages to other members of the party and as soon as a card is complete, they drop it into the box. Each card is properly addressed to some one present but it is signed with some other name than that of the writer. Besides this every effort is made to disguise the writing and hide the identity of the sender of the missive. When the mail box is opened and the cards delivered, each reads his aloud and tries to guess who wrote it. If he names the writer the first guess the latter must acknowledge his guilt and perform whatever forfeit is asked of him by the injured person. Hilarious laughter prevails while the notes are being read and the penalties paid. The penalties consist of performing silly stunts such as winding an imaginary clock or crowing like a rooster or speaking some baby rhyme. In playing the game, be careful not to offend any sensitive person and be sure not to get offended yourself.

THRIFTINESS.—The average amount of savings per capita of the people of Switzerland is $47; in America the average is said to be less than $5. The latest available figures show that about 10 per cent of the people of the United States have savings bank accounts; while more than half of the Swiss population have such accounts.

little while with their own eyes tightly closed.

Toughey's interest in the Evangelist and his picturesque denunciation of sin and sinners waned instantly she discovered that Norma and the children had gone. Soon she left to look for them, though she had told Norma to take them to the grove or beach if they grew tired. But the habit of knowing where they were was too strong to resist, not finding them in the picnic grounds at the swings and seesaws, nor any signs of them from the edge of the cliff she rushed down the path toward the beach almost colliding with Norma and John and hearing Norma declare vehemently: "I am not an Indian and I will never, never marry an Indian."

"Where are the children?" asked Toughey sharply, feeling that Norma should be with them.

"On the beach," the girl answered in confusion, running down the path. As she half tumbled after the girl Toughey noticed the Indian's dejected air. The two girls looked eagerly for the children who were not to be seen. Racing in opposite directions they explored the shore to where the cliff dropped down into the flat meadow land. Wild fear seized Toughey.

"Get John, hunt everywhere, in the grove, tell Mr. Brooke the children are lost or——" She could not say what she thought. She spoke pantingly, for she could not take a deep breath. When Norma had gone, Toughey stepped up the pier which extended out into the deep water quite a distance as large boats from Toronto and other big towns docked here. Walking clear to the end she forced herself to gaze down into the water up one side of the dock and down the other. Her whole body was shaking and the weight on her breast grew heavier every minute, dragging her to her knees as she left the pier.

If Mr. Brooke would only come; perhaps he could do or say something. He did come and other people, but none who could tell of the children. Toughey turned sick as she noted others walking the pier with grave faces, peering down into the water just as she had done. She looked up into Mr. Brooke's white face and spoke at first inaudibly for her lips were stiff.

"Mamma—telephone; don't tell her till—till—we know."

He nodded, looked at his watch.

"They won't expect us yet. I'll wait and if——" he could not trust himself to finish.

Toughey sat on the sand wondering if it were really she—Toughey Deering upon whom this unspeakable horror had fallen.

The meeting ended, the crowds left, ignorant of the situation on the beach, but many of the cottagers heard the story of the lost children and became pathetically anxious to help. Norma and John returned breathless from a fruitless search.

Two men with motor boats offered their services.

"They might have gotten into a row boat and drifted away," suggested one, "we'll go out on the lake and take a look around for them."

Norma uttered a cry. She recalled the little boat on which she had placed the coats. Where was it? Gone! And she distinctly remembered it had been there. Hope leaped up in Toughey, lifting the weight that was threatening to choke her. She rushed to the water's edge and made Norma repeat what she knew about the boat and the coats.

The two men started off in their boats, assuring her that if the children were on the lake they would be sure to find them. Then in came the steamer from Toronto. Mr. Brooke told the story to the Captain and the big boat put off again in search of the little girls. Mr. Brooke telephoned to the farm. His wife was to tell Mrs. Deering they were delayed and would be a little late. She was not to worry. They'd have supper at the Park.

"What's the matter?" insisted Mrs. Brooke.

"A broken dray wheel," answered Mr. Brooke mendaciously—"have to fix up another. No, nobody hurt. Good by," he ended with a shout. He looked at his watch; a steamer was to leave Hamilton in fifteen minutes. He rang up the company.

"Look out for three little girls in a rowboat, supposed to have drifted from the Park dock about two hours ago."

"Yes," came the answer. "All hands would keep a sharp lookout."

Toughey's fear increased. She dreaded lest the children become panic stricken and overturn the boat.

"Those little girls have good heads and plenty of spirit, they'll come out of this all right," cheered Mr. Brooke more hopefully than he felt for he knew how easy it was for people untrained to sit still in a boat to upset it.

Afternoon passed, the sun went down, darkness came. Men passed softly with grappling hooks using them from the pier and small boats. But Toughey saw and heard, though she made no sound but lay upon the sand, her face hidden. Through the weary vigil that followed, Mr. Brooke and his son and daughter sat by her. Norma moved about restlessly sometimes breaking forth into a storm of tears. John stood like a sentinel, ready for any service and obeying an occasional direction from Mr. Brooke.

After a time, according to Toughey's count, had become eternity, the faint sound of a motor boat came across the dark stretch of water. Toughey started up; everyone became painfully intent upon it; it was coming nearer; it must bring news of the children. As the chug chug of the little engine grew more distinct they hurried involuntarily to the end of the pier. Mr. Brooke put Toughey's arm through his. She was trembling violently.

They awaited the boat in silence. Several men with lanterns raised them and presently into the feeble circle of light the dory darted, behind it trailed an empty rowboat. Out of the shadows there loomed up first the big bulk of the owner; next came two little white faces and two little figures, one of them with a sleepy child in its lap. Toughey's lips were unclosed at last—she uttered a cry of joy that was taken up and repeated and multiplied by the crowd on the pier and shore. The little people were handed up in strong arms and there followed an indescribable scene of weeping and laughing and embracing in which twoscore of strangers joined. Everybody concerned in the near tragedy was so excited and nervous that Mr. Brooke made them all sit down and be quiet for a time. Toughey kept her arms about the children feeling as though she could never let them go again. Norma held her little sister, now awake and cross. Mr. Brooke sent his son ahead to one of the hotels in the Park to order hot soup for the party. They must not be hysterical when they reached home for Mr. Brooke and Toughey agreed that her mother and grandmother might well be spared the anguish they, themselves had suffered. There seemed to be no one to blame; it was just a dreadful accident that might properly be forgotten. Tears flowed, however, when the little girls described their terror at finding themselves far from shore. Plainly the rocking of the boat had caused it to slip down into the water. The rope was evidently simply thrown around the post, and while they were pretending, in order to quiet the little Indian, they themselves had dropped off to sleep. A land breeze accomplished the rest.

After they had the hot chicken broth at the hotel, and everybody was fairly normal again, Toughey called her mother on the phone, to say they were starting home and would arrive in about an hour. She also made the children say "hello" and say they were not a bit sleepy. "Having had a nice long nap?" murmured Toughey with a grimace.

Mrs. Deering and Grandmother were awaiting them under the big willows and Toughey was thankful for the darkness. It hid all tears and emotion. Rushing them through the usual good nights Toughey hurried the children and herself to bed.

It was long after their return to Washington that Mrs. Deering learned of the facts of that day at the Park. By an appeal to their affection for their mother and Grandmother, combined with some threatening and considerable bribing, Toughey had succeeded in keeping the children quiet.

Though the incident was published in the Canadian paper as the identity of the children was not known, and Mrs. Deering had a plentiful supply of Washington and New York dailies, Toughey with Mr. Brooke's connivance, was able to keep the local publication out of her hands until the matter ceased to be news. The story finally leaked out, but for years both Mrs. Deering and Grandmother believed that the boat had simply slipped its moorings and a kind man had promptly towed it back.

Indian John's love affair did not prosper, for word came to the Deerings that a year later Norma married a French farm laborer.

The next chapter will tell of the Deering family adventures in Mexico.

years, a constant reader of dear old COMFORT, and I derive much help from the letters in the Sisters' Corner, as I am a young housekeeper. I proclaim COMFORT as being one of the most beneficial papers published. I eagerly read every topic, especially those concerning home and home ties. I am very young, just out of the "teens," and I like to see how others manage.

Husband and I have been married a little over three years, and we are happy. We live in a cozy little country cottage, that nestles among the sunkissed hills of Mississippi, and I wouldn't exchange it and my husband's love for a mansion and millions. I think, like all others, that I have the very best husband on earth. We are still "sweethearts," and he is so good to help me with my work when he is around. I am sure a more devoted husband cannot be found. We have a little golden-haired blue-eyed girl, Edith Eileen, aged twenty months. She is just a little fairy God has sent to complete our little home—only a gift from our father on high.

In one of the past numbers of COMFORT I read a very touching letter from a girl. I do not remember the initials, but my heart goes out to her. I can just imagine how her poor heart craves parental love. It is natural for children to long for just one affectionate word, one loving caress from mother. My dear girl, your parents love you, but have just neglected making any demonstrations of their love. I am going to show my love for my little darling. I am going to let her know that mother is her very best friend. I want her to confide in me. I want her to feel free to "chum" with mother. She never closes her little eyes without mother's good night kiss. She thinks she can't sleep without it. I think parents should show their love for their children and then they will have nothing to regret. There will never come the thought of "what might have been." There would be less broken hearts and fewer outcasts. Lack of love from parents, or a failure to show their love, is the cause of so many wrecked lives. It's the cause of so many boys and girls going out into the cold world to work. There they do not find the love they crave and they think no one cares. Fathers, mothers, give the desired caresses and loving kindness to your children. Let them know you love them and then you'll have nothing to regret.

I do not feel competent to discuss the subject most discussed—"suffrage!" However, I do not object to those who wish to vote doing so. I will say that when we can have a hand in the making of the laws, I will go to the polls with my husband. I do not think it a disgrace for women to vote.

I do a great deal of fancy work, I make tatting, crochet and I embroider some. I do not neglect my household duties for my fancy work. I can find many spare moments in the afternoon, and I can find nothing better than fancy work to improve the time.

I trust all enjoyed the holidays and may 1917 bring all more happiness than have the years before is the wish of A New Sister. MRS. MACK GRAVES.

MONROE, N. Y.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

It's three years since I visited our corner and want to say I have made many friends through COMFORT.

I smiled when I read Mrs. Thixton's letter and I quite agree with her on the divorce question. If they start right, the wife won't allow any abusive treatment. Now, many wives are very unhappy because their husbands carry the pocketbook, and they never have a penny to call their own. Now, before I married, I had a complete understanding with my husband that our marriage would be a partnership and that the financial part would be shared equally. When my husband gets his wages he tosses it in my lap and says, "there you are," and it's quite cheerfully spoken. We both know to a penny how much money we have, so we don't have any trouble on that account.

I don't believe in large families, and that too, we discussed, and agreed that if we raised two children, strong, healthy and well educated we would be doing the world and society at large far more benefit, than if we had twelve that might be weak minded, criminals and beggars, depending on the community for clothing and food.

In other words I believe in eugenics; and am much interested in every strong, healthy baby that I see.

I don't believe in that "married fifty years and have never had a quarrel." That's out of date.

I wouldn't give two cents for a man or woman who wouldn't speak up when they know they are right and say that they are. Yes, someone is offended or has a huff on for a while, but see how much you like the making up part. It's like the sun—it shines brighter after the storm.

I believe in suffrage and although not an active worker I always express my views on that subject whenever I have a chance.

I am running a chicken business on a small scale. Last spring I hatched fifteen hundred chicks. Some were hatched with a small incubator, but mostly with hens. I sold lots of broilers and besides we had "frys" often ourselves, to say nothing of fowls, eggs, etc. There are good markets here and within easy reach of New York City to ship eggs, fowls, etc.

I have had opportunity to observe city life as compared with farm life, and want to say it would come dreadfully hard to have to put my hand in my pocketbook for the price of a meal instead of going down cellar for the supplies. I don't see why more people don't go to the country to live. They don't know what living is until they plant their garden and watch it grow.

I am starting a State quilt and would be grateful for pieces of calico, velvet or woolen goods.

I want to make a flower garden next spring, and would like to get a few seeds from every state. In return I'll send some hollyhock seeds. I have some lovely ones.

I will be glad to hear from all who enclose a stamp, and would like to receive a card shower for my birthday, May 18th. I will be twenty-three. Who is my twin? Will answer all who write.

Cordially yours, MRS. HARRY BENJAMIN.

RANGER, NEBR.

TO THE SISTERS' CORNER:

I have been reading the sisters' letters this morning and have decided to write too. I hardly know what to start on for there are so many interesting topics. The talks on rearing children are always of interest to me for I have two boys of my own who are ever a source of pleasure to us. The older is five, just at the questioning age, and such questions! It is often a puzzle how to best answer in a truthful and satisfying manner. How little a child knows and how much we much teach, if we would do our duty.

As to divorce, I am neither for nor against it. There are always two sides to each case and often it seems necessary. But seriously, now, don't you think it is too common and too much the fashion? It isn't frowned on as it should be. If there were no such thing as divorce there would be no divorces, but there you are, and we have both. I used to think it was more prevalent among the real, idle rich, and perhaps it is, but anyone who takes the time, has time for such foolishness. This divorcing one mate for another regardless of consequences, broken hearts or homes, I mean does not seem right. Modern fiction, especially the higher priced magazines all tend to the "Problems" of wives and husbands and "coveting thy neighbor's wife." It's the fashion, that's all. I don't think they should be made so much of—these "problems" women and men have to face, such as finding themselves in love with someone else, etc. They should nip such things in the bud. If it wasn't so much talked of and so constantly before us in print, and on our minds, maybe, there wouldn't be so much of it. Authors seem to think their duty is not done unless there is something wrong somewhere. How many of us, were we to sit down and write out our pretty little romances, and try to get them in print, would succeed? Not many. They wouldn't be exciting enough. No, no, the public demand excitement. But then, these are just my "ideas."

What a wholesome, intelligent class the writers of letters to the Sisters' Corner represent. The right sort of paper for the right sort of people, that is what COMFORT is. Such letters are more fitted to our needs, more helpful and uplifting than lots of stories.

I haven't said a word yet about Uncle Charlie's splendid talk on white slavery. I would like to help with his Home but subscriptions are hard to get here as all of my neighbors are subscribers, but I'll help what I can though.

With best wishes for one and all,
Sincerely, MRS. ARTHUR BABCOCK.

CARLYSS, LA.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

Several years ago I wrote to this corner. I was only a bride then, now I am the mother of a dear little girl four years old, and a widow. My husband died in less than two years after we were married. But I am blessed with good parents and make my home with them.

Sisters, I would like to get a colored girl to do housework, one that can cook. I would give her a good home and her clothes, just to help as I do not want her to do all the drudgery, but just help mother and me around the house. I received several letters from one (when my address was printed with the recipe) asking for a home on those conditions but I lost the address. I would like to hear from her again.

We live on a farm. Raise corn, cane, sweet and Irish potatoes, rice and all kinds of vegetables. We have very good winters and never any extreme cold. I would like to visit some of the Northern sisters in the winter, just to see what snow looks like.

I would like flower seeds, also reading matter, as my purse is too thin to purchase such.

I am five feet, four inches tall, brown hair and eyes and am only twenty-two years old, so you see, sisters, I was quite young when I was married—only sixteen. Girls, stay in school till you are graduated, help mother a few years and then think of marriage—by that time you will be old enough to realize what you are doing.

I will close, hoping to hear from some of the sisters.
Sincerely, MRS. EUNA WETHERILL.

Washington

BY JOHN PIERPONT

The following original hymn was sung at the celebration on the 22nd of February, 1835. I think in the Old South Meeting House, Boston.

To thee, beneath whose eye
Each circling century
  Obedient rolls,
Our Nation in its prime Looked with a faith sublime
And trusted in "the time
  That tried men's soul."

When from this gate of Heaven
People and priest were driven
  By fire and sword,
And, where thy saints had prayed,
The harnessed war horse neighed
And horsemen's trumpet brayed
  In harsh accord.

Nor was our fathers' trust,
Thou Mighty One and just,
  Then put to shame.
"Up to the hills" for light
Looked they in perils' night,
And from yon guardian height
  Deliverance came.

There like an angel form,
Sent down to still the storm,
  Stood Washington!
Clouds broke and rolled away;
Foes fled in pale dismay;
Wreathed were his brows with bay
  When war was done.

God of our sires and sons,
Let other Washingtons
  Our country bless,
And like the brave and wise
Of by-gone centuries,
Show that true greatness lies
  In righteousness.

"The Woman Who Understands"

(REQUESTED)

"Somewhere she waits to make you win, your soul in her firm white hands,
Somewhere the gods have made for you, the woman who understands.

"As the tide went out, she found him
  Lashed to a spar of despair,
The wreck of his ship around him—
  The wreck of his dreams in the air;
Found him and loved him and gathered
  The soul of him close to her heart—
The soul that had sailed an uncharted sea,
  The soul that had sought to win and be free—
The soul of which she was a part.
  And there in the dusk she cried to the man,
'Win your battle—you can, you can.'

"Broken by fate, unrelenting,
  Scarred by the lashings of chance;
Bitter his heart, unrepenting—
  Hardened by circumstance;
Shadowed by failure ever,
  Cursing, he would have died,
But the touch of her hand, her strong warm hand,
  And the love of his soul took full command,
Just at the turn of the tide;
  Standing beside him, filled with trust,
'Win,' she whispered, 'you must, you must!'

"Helping and loving and guiding,
  Urging when that were best,
Holding her fears in hiding
  Deep in her quiet breast;
This is the woman who kept him
  True to his standards lost,
When, tossed in the storm and stress of strife,
  He thought himself through with the game of life
And ready to pay the cost,
  Watching and guarding, whispering still,
'Win, you can—and you will, you will.'

"This is the story of ages,
  This is the woman's way;
Wiser than seers or sages,
  Lifting us day by day;
Facing all things with a courage
  Nothing can daunt or dim,
Treading life's path, wherever it leads—
  Lined with flowers or choked with weeds,
But ever with him—with him!
  Guider—comrade—Golden-spur,
The men who win are helped by her!

"Somewhere, she waits, strong in belief, your soul in her firm white hands:
Thank well the gods, when she comes to you—'The Woman who Understands.'"

My Shadow

I have a little shadow, that goes in and out with me,
And what can be the use of him is more than I can see,
He is very, very like me from the heels up to the head;
And I see him jump before me when I jump into my bed.

The funniest thing about him is the way he likes to grow—
Not at all like proper children, which is always very slow;
For he sometimes shoots up taller like an India rubber ball,
And he sometimes gets so little that there's none of him at all.

He hasn't got a notion of how children ought to play,
And can only make a fool of men in every sort of way,
He stays so close beside me, he's a coward you can see;
I'd think it shame to stick to nursie as that shadow sticks to me.

One morning very early, before the sun was up
I rose and found the shining dew on every buttercup,
But my lazy little shadow, like an arrant sleepy-head
Had stayed at home behind me, and was fast asleep in bed.

Robert Louis Stevenson.

What Might Be Done

What might be done if men were wise—
  What glorious deeds, my suffering brother,
  Would they unite
  In love and right,
  And cease their scorn of one another.

Opression's heart might be imbued
  With kindling drops of loving kindness;
  And knowledge pour
  From shore to shore
  Light on the eyes of mental blindness.

All slavery, warfare, lies and wrongs,
  All vice and crime might die together;
  And wine and corn
  To each man born,
  Be free as warmth in summer weather.

The meanest wretch that ever trod,
  The depest sunk in guilt and sorrow,
  Might stand erect
  In self-respect
  And share the teeming world tomorrow.

What might be done? This might be done,
  And more than this, my suffering brother—
  More than the tongue
  E'er said or sung,
  If men were wise and loved each other.

—Charles Mackay.

Words

"One day a harsh word rashly said
Upon an evil journey sped.
And like a sharp and cruel dart,
It pierced a fond and loving heart;
It turned a friend into a foe,
And everywhere brought pain and woe.

"A kind word followed it one day,
Flew swiftly on its blessed way;
It healed the wound, it soothed the pain
And friends of old are friends again;
It made the hate and anger cease,
And everywhere brought joy and peace."

Best Ways of Doing Things Around The Home

Spirits of camphor will remove white spots from varnish.

A tablespoonful of corn-starch is a very good substitute for an egg in baking cakes.

When washing windows put a little kerosene in the water and you will find they dry quicker and are much brighter. Ammonia is also good.

Sprinkle a little flour in the frying pan to prevent grease popping onto the stove.

Never put table linen into soap suds until all the stains have been removed.

Wax for sealing bottles containing fruit may be made by melting together equal parts of resin and beef suet.

The smell of tobacco from the evening pipe and cigars will have disappeared by morning if a large bowl of water is put in the room over night.

To clean glazed tiles when spotted, wash them with lemon juice, leave for fifteen minutes and then polish with a soft cloth.

Salt sprinkled on grease spilled on the stove will prevent it from smoking.

Light soapsuds are said to be excellent for making plants grow and blossom, on account of the potash therein.

When polishing floors make a thick pad of felt or velvet and fasten it over a worn-out broom. This makes an excellent polisher and saves the trouble of kneeling on the floor.

To the lady who asked for the remedy for lice I would suggest that she get ten cents' worth of Cocus Indicus or Fish Berries, as they are called, and break and soak in alcohol twenty-four hours. Apply to head. One or two applications will be sufficient.

TWINE FROM PAPER.—German manufacturers are now making twine out of paper, because of the scarcity of raw materials for the manufacture of string and twine. The products which have been placed on the market resemble those made from jute and hemp. This is by no means the first time that paper pulp has been used for such purposes for Japan made yarn from this pulp more than 100 years ago.

Comfort's League of Cousins

Please observe carefully the following directions which explain exactly

How to become a Member

Send thirty cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

Or, if your subscription is already paid in advance, you can take a friend's one-year subscription at 25 cents and send it in with five cents of your own, thirty cents in all, with your request for membership, and we will send you the button and membership certificate, and send COMFORT to your friend for one year. League subscriptions do not count in premium clubs.

NEVER apply for membership without enclosing thirty cents to include a new subscription or a renewal.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth. It costs but thirty cents to join, and that gives you at least a one-year subscription to COMFORT also, without extra cost.

Never in the world's history was so much given for so little. Never could thirty cents be invested to such advantage, and bring such splendid returns. Don't hesitate. Join us at once and induce your friends to do likewise.

All those League members who desire a list of the cousins residing in the several states, can secure the same by sending a stamped addressed envelope and five cents in stamps to Nellie Rutherford, 1299 Park Place, Brooklyn, New York grand secretary.

Special Notice

Never write a subscription or renewal order or application for membership in the body of a letter. Write your subscription or renewal and membership application on a separate sheet of paper, separate from your letter. We have to put all subscription orders on our subscription file at once; so if it is written on the same sheet as your letter, the whole letter has to go on to the subscription file at once and thus can receive no attention from Uncle Charlie.

Never send subscriptions to Uncle Charlie nor to the Secretary of the League; they bother him and cause confusion and delay.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

The poor souls whose names appear in the above list are in too desperate need to care for anything but substantial financial aid. They cannot eat or wear sympathy, and they despise tracts. Fork out your silver or your currency. It is the only thing that goes with God or man. Sympathy and cash make a splendid combination, but sympathy without cash cuts no icicles. Nerine's Second Choice left until twelve o'clock—and the three girls had been loath to leave the drawing-room fire for their beds. As Kit had said, "One got no beauty sleep if one wasn't in bed before twelve, and as that was past one might as well sit up and enjoy one's self."

Nerine had forgotten her theft from Mayne's room until she was at last hastening regretfully up the wide stair and through the cold halls to her bedroom in Agatha's wake, and the book in her pocket banged against her as she ran.

Should she speak about it or not? She waited until they were in their rooms which opened into one another. For a time she fidgeted about instead of undressing. Agatha was not like her; she had a set of principles and lived up to them. Mr. Mayne's whole library might have been spread out before her and she would not have touched a volume.

The younger sister pinched the stolen book through her dress and took courage. It was her mother's, and it belonged far more to herself and to Agatha than to Mayne. She advanced toward Agatha's room.

"What do you think? I——" She stopped short in her disclosure.

Comfort's Bedtime Stories For Little Folks!

A Library of Cute Little Books

40 WONDERFUL TALES IN STORY AND VERSE 40

Beautifully Illustrated

Library of 12 Sent For One Subscription!

The stories of our childhood—how well we remember them. After all it seems but a short time since we listened with rapt attention to the adventures of Robinson Crusoe cast away on his lonely island—of beautiful Cinderella, the fairy and the prince—the tragic fate of poor little Red Riding Hood—these were only a few of the marvelous tales that thrilled our childish imagination and helped us spend many blissful hours.

The children of today are the same as they were fifty years ago. And these good old-time stories are just as popular with the young folks now as they were then. So we have decided to give our little boy and girl friends a fine big collection of these stories including some of the old-time favorites as well as a number of newer and later books equally as interesting. We have arranged three different sets or "libraries"—each library consisting of twelve books, no two alike, and you can have your choice of any one library, or two libraries, or all three libraries. Library No. 7951 comprises the following twelve titles:

Robinson Crusoe, Little Red Riding Hood, Cinderella, Mother Goose, Animal Pets, Purring Pussies, Playmates, Our Pets, The Three Bears, The Sleeping Beauty, Playful Pets, The Teddy Bears.

Library No. 7991 has these twelve titles:

The Shepherd And His Sheep, Young America, The Deep Blue Sea, Land of Tulips, Rex and Rover, Our Farm Yard, Little Darlings, Childhood of Hiawatha, Faithful Friends, The Fancy Dress Party, Our Country, Happy Days.

Library No. 8001 consists of these twelve titles:

Little Sweethearts, The Story of Little Piggie Wig, In The Jungle, The Big League, Doggie Doings, Fred's Feathered Friends, Uncle Jerry's Farm, Chums, The Story of Santa Claus, Little Laddies, Pussy's Pranks, Faithful And True.

As these stories are intended for the younger children some of them have been "boiled down" to the fewest and simplest words so that they are not as complete as the original editions, but all of them are printed on fine paper in large clear type that is easy to see and read and have no less than five beautiful full page illustrations in colors.

Some of the titles named above of course need no introduction. The other titles are just the sort of stories that delight every child—stories of childish sports, flowers, the sea, Indians, animal pets, horses, donkeys, dogs, bunnies, pussy cats, chickens, lambs, etc., wonderful romances in which there are old Stone Castles, Kings, Queens, Princes, Princesses, Good Fairies, and Wicked Fairies, stories of the Bear Family—Pa Bear, old Ma Bear and little "Teddy" Bear, stories of little Playmates, the true tale of the Teddy Bears—in fact the finest collection of juvenile short stories ever published. Each book is nicely bound with a handsomely illustrated cover in colors and is 4 inches by 5¼ inches in size.

There is nothing you could get for the children that would make them any happier than one or more of these cute libraries and best of all it will cost you nothing as we are giving them away as a premium. We will send you free your choice of any one, two, or all three libraries—each library consisting of twelve stories, each story in a book by itself, twelve different books in all—on the terms of the following special offers:

Offer A. For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25 cents we will send you any one library of twelve books by parcel post prepaid. Be sure to mention number of library wanted.

Offer B. For your own subscription or renewal or extension of your present subscription for one year at 25 cents and 10 cents additional (35 cents in all) we will send you any one library by parcel post prepaid. Be sure to mention number of library wanted.

Offer C. For two one-year subscriptions at 25 cents each, or one 3-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents we will send you any two libraries, or for three one-year subscriptions at 25 cents each, we will send you all three libraries, parcel post prepaid. Don't forget to give number or numbers of libraries wanted.

Extra Gift For Promptness! If you will send three subscriptions and 75 cents for all three libraries within 15 days we will send you four extra books absolutely free. This will give you one grand complete library of forty of these splendid little books, all different titles, of uniform size and binding, handsomely printed and illustrated in colors. Premium No. 7303

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In order that each cousin may be answered in this column, no cousin must ask more than three questions in one Month.

WELL, my dears, did you get through the first month of the new year with all your resolutions just as nice and unbroken as when you began with them? But there, you don't have to answer. It is none of my affair whether you did or not. If I guess that you didn't it is simply because I am a horrid old thing who doesn't make any allowance for youth and temptation and all those. But you may think what you please, I didn't break any resolutions, because I didn't make any. However, let's forget it and this time next year we can go over it all again in the same old way. Now to work instead of talk.

The first letter I take up is from Water Lily of Kaufman, Texas and she is in love with the best man in the world, even if he is divorced, and he is in love with her and her horrid mother won't let them see each other and the Lily wants to know what she should do. I wish I could settle all the questions that come to me as easy as I can this one. The Lily is of age, or soon will be, the man is really a nice man, and it is so perfectly easy for them to marry and be happy that I don't understand why they don't do it. They have my blessing, if that will be any help.

Girlie, Cosmos, Okla.—Forget the insignificant deformity which will not count for anything if you have an attractive character and a kindly way with you. If the young man you admire—don't begin to love him till he is ready for it—cares for you as he should he won't notice that you are not perfect in books. Love, you know, is blind anyway. Besides, skin beauty fades while soul beauty never does.

Faithful, Chowchilla, Cal.—It's a poor way to win your friend from a girl who is more attractive to him than you are, whatever her character may be, by writing letters to her people making her out probably worse than she is. If he doesn't care enough for himself to go into good company, and that company yours, you should keep hands off and let him go his way. If you have not stopped your crusade against your rival, do so now and be sorry you went as far as you did.

Four Girls, Mauriceville, Texas.—Four of you and each sweet sixteen, each in school and each in love. Well, stick to your school and by the time you have finished it, you will have forgotten the loves of today and will be just as much troubled by the later loves. You can finish your schooling, but you never can finish your loving. P. S. That young man who is so bashful and is yet a flirt, is so different from ordinary bashful ones that you should put him in a museum.

Freckles and Dimples, Olathe, Colo.—In old-fashioned days gentlemen always kissed the hands of ladies when they met, but in these new-fangled times hand kissing is not what it used to be and you should not permit it. (2) Of course, the young man, who tells you he loves you every time he meets you, says the same thing to every other girl. It's a silly way some young men have and only silly girls believe them. (3) Treat all the nice young men exactly alike and if you happen to care more for one of them than for the others he will not know it. Talk at the gate and walk along the leafy lanes is quite proper and permissible. Rules of etiquette do not apply to four people who don't know any better than to crowd into a buggy built for two.

Violet, Roberdell, N. C.—If he has all the qualities that make a good husband and you love each other, don't bother a minute about his age. Maybe if he were younger he wouldn't be half as nice and he might be flirting with other girls as some young husbands love to do. I think you have a prize, and you have my blessing.

Slavey, Hardin, Ky.—For a motherless girl of fifteen to have charge of a family of seven with a father who does not appreciate her position and help her all he can, is indeed hard, but don't marry to escape it. You are jumping out of the frying-pan into the fire. Meet your responsibilities as best you can and it will not be long until you are old enough and are capable enough to go out and work for yourself and be independent of everybody. Of course, if you meet some nice man when you are old enough to marry, it will be right and proper for you to marry, but don't ever marry just to get rid of other troubles.

Discontented, Palestine, Texas.—What else, my dear, could he do but forsake you when he proposed to you in writing and you did not answer though he waited two years for you to do so? How long did you expect him to wait? You had no right to question his sincerity, but should have answered yes or no and settled it. Now that you have lost him, through your own devices, you must find him again that way because I cannot help you, and wouldn't if I could. (2) It is not wise for a girl to ask even her "close-by friend" to take her to places, because men are apt to resent it. The only exception is to church and there a girl may ask any man to take her, because that is spiritual, not social.

Two Girls, Greensboro, N. C.—The only safe course to pursue when a girl is in love with two young men is to drop them both, because if she drops either one she will pine for the other and be unhappy. (2) Listen, girls, omit the osculation.

Brown Eyes, Iola, Texas.—My, my, but you are awfully silly. When he was fifteen he didn't want you around and now that he is seventeen and still doesn't want you, can't you understand that he is not for you? You are enough older than he is to know that much, I should think.

Elbe, Melrose, N. M.—For the benefit of postal clerks who have enough other troubles I will not give you the postage stamp language. The only sensible place for a stamp is the usual one where it may be most easily cancelled. The inside of the envelope is the proper place for the expression of your tender sentiments.

Calla, St. Michael, Pa.—There is no rule by which lost lovers may be restored, and those who do come back, do so because they want to and not because of any effort to bring them. Leave him to do as he wishes, and leave the rest to Providence.

Wildflower, Breese, Ill.—If he deceived you into loving him by not telling you he had a wife from whom he was not yet divorced, do you think he is the kind of man who would become a husband who could be trusted? You may be willing to risk him, but I wouldn't.

Undecided, Thornton, Texas.—You say you are in love with "to boys" and want my advice, but what are "to boys?" I never heard of any boys like that and I can't find it in the spelling-book.

Blue Eyes, Webb City, Mo.—Your chief mistakes are in being too finicky over small matters and in trying to harmonize with a young man who is about as finicky as you are. Harmony cannot exist under such conditions and you might as well give it up and find a different disposition to harmonize with. The greatest mistake of all is in two people of such dispositions getting married. P. S. As you are in the high school you should not write: "I have a gentleman friend which I admire." "Gentleman friend" is bad form and "which" isn't that kind of a relative pronoun. Ask your teacher.

Myrtle, Hany, N. C.—Never try to get a sweetheart back who has deserted you without your giving him cause. You can't get him back. He's tired of you and he is glad to get away. It is sad and it is bad, but you know if you were tired of him you would treat him just as he treats you. They always do.

Springtime, Tampa, Fla.—If you love him with his false and spiteful ways, why ask me what you should do? I could only tell you to give up that kind of a sweetheart and choose one who was not false and not spiteful and you don't want that kind. So you must put up with what you like best, my dear.

Troubled, Ellerton, Ga.—I think I can see this young man with tears in his eyes telling you you do not love him or you would let him kiss you. Let me tell you, my dear, that if you marry him as he asks you to, he will never cry to kiss you, though he may cry to kiss some other woman. You are very foolish if you do not take your father's advice and go to college.

Marie, Wave, Ill.—I am very glad to hear that my advice has stopped the kissing until you are engaged. If the young man wants to know why there is to be no more promiscuous kissing, tell him I told you it wasn't right and you would believe me before you would believe any young man who wants to kiss every girl he goes with.

Freckles, Dayton, Ohio.—The trouble with you, my dear, is that you are too narrow minded to understand that a girl should have friends among young men, not necessarily lovers, and that when one wants to be attentive for the moment, it does not mean that you have a claim upon his exclusive and permanent attention. Take a wider view of human association and don't narrow it down to your own selfish notion, or to the belief that every young man you meet wants to marry you. Most of them don't.

Dimples, Crookston, Minn.—As both of you attend the same school and have not met each other and you seem to be more anxious to meet him than he to meet you, suppose you ask your teacher to introduce you to each other properly.

Down Hearted, Bluefields, W. Va.—Don't be down hearted this soon. You can't have him till he's through college and that will take four years, plenty time enough for your heart to be up and around and all right again.

Brown Eyes, Parkersburg, W. Va.—When a sixteen-year-old girl and an eighteen-year-old boy get the silly idea into their noddles that they must marry, they should be put in charge of a nurse with instructions to spank them every time they mentioned the subject. Show this to your parents, with my regards.

Amri, Cleveland, Minn.—Marriage is not always a failure, but when it is, it is oftener so because foolish girls like you are go into it without the least idea what it really means. Now you listen to your mother. She knows what it is and she will not give you any bad advice.

Wondering, Austin, Texas.—He sounds all right, my dear, but beware of the smooth tongues and ingratiating ways. He may be exactly as represented, but I have my doubts, because you say he drinks and goodness knows what else he does. You have told him you were never kissed and I am inclined to think he is trying to see if he can't be first in the field. That he seems to be so anxious to marry you and is able to support a wife are two things in his favor, but he might change if you kissed him. It is a difficult case and you must exercise your own knowledge and wisdom. It is too much for me to decide.

Fairy, Colonial Beach, Va.—So far you have handled the young man properly and treated him as he deserved to be treated. He isn't bad at all, just too young to know any better and as you are older than he is, you might as well tell him not to come around any more until he has grown up. You will not miss a great deal, I imagine.

Dolly Dimple, Ripley, Tenn.—Don't give up your school next year to go in the store and don't give it up at all until you have learned how to write a letter that no school girl should be ashamed of. Yours is a sad reflection both upon you and your teacher.

Violet, Gatesville, Texas.—As you don't want to marry the one who has asked you and you do want to marry the one who hasn't, suppose you wait till the other has proposed and you won't want to marry him either. Still a girl twenty-five years old shouldn't be too sassy.

Birdie, Elkin, N. C.—When a girl always quarrels with any young man who is attentive to her it is a good sign that she should not marry and be tied to a quarrelsome existence for life. Remain a bachelor girl.

Dixie, Maben, Ala.—The trouble with you, my dear, is that you are too superior to your associates and the women and girls can't help being envious and jealous and saying mean things about you. My advice is for you to keep in the background and let the other take your place in front. You say you always try to be nice to everybody and good and kind to all, and this is your chance to be popular with everybody by effacing yourself. What do you care anyway, having so fine a man for a real sweetheart? It is quite the proper and customary thing to seal an engagement with a kiss, whether the Maben married ladies did theirs that way, or not.

Nineteen, Marcellus, N. Y.—Maybe true love isn't built on candy, as sweet as it may be, but there are plenty of girls these days who wouldn't think of loving a young man who would not feed them on caramels and such. As between this one who doesn't feed you on candy and the other one you never saw, but have been writing to for three years, I think I would choose the one who didn't give me candy.

There, my dears, how many of you are not satisfied with what I have said to you? I'm sorry if you're not, because the less you like it the more you need it. However, it's all for the best and may all of us be a thousand times better than we are. By, by and the good Lord watch over us.

COUSIN MARION.

Poultry Farming For Women

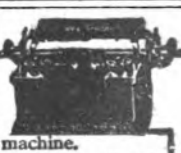
might be to blame, though it is not very probable. Did you use any strong insect powder on the chickens or the hens who are brooding them? I have occasionally heard of one chick being blind in a flock, but never of a large number, as you describe, and it is especially strange, as you say they are well and strong, with eyes that look quite normal. If any of our readers have had similar experiences, I should like to hear from them, and to know what ideas they have about the probable cause.

J. C. H.—I cannot answer letters by mail. Your questions were answered in this column last month.



E. H.—Please read answer to J. D. in this issue. (2) The two small eggs you sent have been carefully examined. The larger one looks quite normal, but the smaller one was black and oblong in shape when received, so I imagine it must have been in that condition when you opened the bird, though in your letter you only remark on the eggs being hard. There must have been some abnormal condition of the egg passage if the eggs were really hard, but as they were still so small when the hen was killed, it is difficult to say what they might have developed into before being laid. When a laying hen, or a hen who is about to lay, is killed and opened, a cluster of eggs which look like grapes will be found; this is called the ovarium. These, however, are but rudimentary eggs, and are in size from a pin's head to the full-sized yolk of an egg. Each of these eggs is contained within a thin transparent sac, and attached by a narrow pipe or stem to the ovary, and during the laying period of the hen these eggs are maturing, and thus keep up the supply which she lays. These rudimentary eggs have neither shell nor white, consisting wholly of yolk, on which floats the germ of the future chicken, and as they become larger they arrive at a certain stage when, by their own volition, weight, or other cause, they become detached from the bunch and fall into a sort of funnel leading into a passage called the oviduct—this organ in the hen being from twenty-two to twenty-six inches long. During the passage of this egg or ovum to the outer world, it becomes coated with successive layers of albumen—the white—which is secreted from the blood vessels of the oviduct in the form of a thick glairy fluid, and is prevented from mixing with the yolk by the membrane or sac which surrounded it before it became detached from the cluster. It is also strengthened by a second and stronger membrane, formed around the first immediately after falling into the funnel, and having what is like two twisted cords of a more dense albuminous character, called by anatomists chalazes, which pass quite through the white at the ends, and being, as it were, embedded therein, thus preventing the yolk and germ from rolling about when the egg is moved, and serving to keep the germ so that it may best receive the heat imparted during incubation. It is during the passage of the egg through the lower part of the oviduct that it gets covered with the two skins which are found inside the shell. These, although lying close around the egg, at the thick end become separate, and form what is called the air bubble or chamber. Eggs are produced from the surplus food, which is that over and above what is required for the sustenance of the hen, and, if such is too stimulating, or given in excessive quantities, the result is that in the former case the ova are produced so rapidly that sometimes two of them drop into the oviduct together, which results in the eccentricities which frequently puzzle the poultry keeper. These ova travel along together through the passage and receive the white separately, but become enveloped in one shell, and when laid are commonly known as double-yolked eggs, but more properly it is a double egg, the white being duplicated as well as the yolk. Should these yolks be fertilized and the egg hatched, we get the occasional four-legged or other chicken monstronsities. To overfeeding is also attributable the further irregularity of one perfect egg being found within another, and caused by irritation of the oviduct, which, contracting in front of the perfectly formed egg instead of behind it, forces it back until it meets another yolk, when the two join and again become coated with the white and the shell, thus producing another wonder. To the internal fatness of the hen are due other eccentricities than those mentioned, including the apparently paradoxical feat of laying rotten new-laid eggs, this being a not infrequent occurrence. The egg, being unabled to force its way through the fatty oviduct, is retained two or three days near the mouth of this organ, and, if a fertilized one, the heat of the hen's body tends to putrefy it, and when ultimately laid it is in an addled condition. To other causes, but principally diseased organs, is due a departure from normal in the way of color. A hen which lays white or brown eggs, on rare occasions produces one almost black, and in most instances, the shells are rough, wavy, corrugated, or otherwise irregular. Then there are instances of foreign matter being found in eggs, clots of blood being nothing unusual. This is the result of the breaking of a blood vessel internally, and, again, possibly the effect of overfeeding. Fowls from whatever cause producing any of the above misshapen or otherwise faulty eggs should at once be got rid of, for although in some cases a reduced diet may bring them back to their normal production, still the slightest cause will frequently prompt the organs to their previous irregularities.

The Family Doctor

So many inquiries are received from COMFORT subscribers concerning the health of the family that this column will be devoted to answering them. The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be addressed to physicians, not to us.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this and all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

F. M., Angelice, Wis.—If the wart is of the ordinary kind it may be removed by applications of lunar caustic, to be had at any drug-store. Be careful in using not to get it on the skin as it will burn painfully. If that will not remove it you should consult a doctor, as warts sometimes are more serious than they look.

E. F., Limestone, N. Y.—Your fainting when you hear sickness talked about is an idiosyncrasy for which there is no clear explanation and no cure. Some people faint at the sight of blood, the great Napoleon turned pale at the sight of a cat and thousands of others for some reason or other unknown are affected in one way or another as you are by hearing sickness spoken of. The only remedy is to keep out of hearing when such a subject is being talked of.

M. M. W., Leon, Iowa.—Acne is an inflammation of the follicles generally affecting the skin at the time of going from childhood to maturity and when the permanent hair of the body is being developed. This inflammation, called folliculitis, causes pimples and other skin eruptions, appearing usually on the face, but as well on the breast, shoulders and back in many cases. The exact cause is not known fully, but it is influenced by conditions of the stomach, bowels and blood. It is at its worst between the ages of thirteen and thirty, but rarely shows in older people. Acne is of two kinds, simplex and rosacea, which is its adult form. There are cases of acne, which develop into skin disorders of a serious character, but ordinarily simple lotions for external use, cleanliness and a proper regard for diet is the treatment. Any physician of average intelligence should be able to give all the treatment necessary in simple cases. Complicated, or chronic cases require much more careful and intelligent handling.

Mrs. E. T., Hinsdale, Mont.—A sharp pain starting in the pit of the stomach and going through under the shoulder blade is one sign of indigestion, but as you have had it only twice in five years, you have nothing to worry about. These casual pains, even though they are very disagreeable for a short time are the result of some temporary disorder and have no after effects.

Mrs. M. O., Kahoka, Mo.—No substitute has been found for alcohol in the compounding of drugs and other uses and you need not fear that any legislation, however "dry," will prevent its use in those connections. There is a very considerable difference between pure alcohol and the usual alcoholic beverages classified as the Demon Rum. (2) The electric needle we believe is the most thorough depilatory. There are numerous chemical depilatories, but we fancy none is better than the unsatisfactory one you used, because they are all more or less troublesome and we imagine you want something that isn't any trouble.

L. H., Scotia, Nebr.—It is foolish for one to suppose because there is a pain around the heart that there is organic heart disease, as many do on the slightest discomfort in that delicate region, but when the heart beats as yours does and there is soreness and dizziness, it is time you were having a doctor examine you and determine what is wrong and make it right if he can. Unless you attend to this properly under a physician's care, one of these days you will have a spell and you will not need anybody except the undertaker. A stitch in time very often saves the whole cloth.

Anxious, Athens, Ga.—We don't believe you are half as much in danger from consumption as you are from indigestion. The doctor, who told you nothing was the matter with you and to eat a plenty, should at the same time have told you what to eat in order to prevent indigestion. Suppose you ask him to prescribe a healthy diet for you as he knows your case and we do not. A seventeen-year-old girl ought to live for sixty-five years yet and have average health to the end. If she does not, she is more at fault than anybody else.

J. O. P., Belfield, N. Dak.—Chilblains are caused by a feebleness of circulation and while that continues you will be subject to them in variations of temperature, and care should be taken to prevent exposure to cold. The system should be built up with plenty of nourishing and digestible food, and no tight shoes, corsets or other garments to impede the circulation should be worn. Dress loosely. A liniment of equal parts of turpentine and copaiba may be used if the skin is not broken. If the skin is broken a preparation of collodion,—ask your druggist for it—may be used as a protection. Though you say you have seen doctors and they could do you no good, we tell you that if they cannot, nobody can. You certainly cannot.

D. B., Union City, Tenn.—The symptoms of itch are a terrible itching caused by a microscopic bug, acarus, boring into the skin. The scratching results in pimples where the bug is and it may extend all over the body, though it is confined frequently only to the hands. The itch is not a blood disease and the treatment is by applications to kill the parasite. Sulphur ointment is the usual remedy, but something more searching is a preparation of flowers of sulphur, one dram; ammoniated mercury, fifteen grains; olive oil, half ounce; lard, two ounces and a half. This should be thoroughly rubbed in, after a bath in hot water and soap and continued night and morning for three days, to be followed by another hot bath. It should be remembered that sulphur is very irritating to the skin of children. Itch is primarily a dirt disease and cleanliness is one of the requisites for its prevention and cure.

Ignorant, Townsend, Fla.—As dryness of the air is the first consideration of climate for consumption and catarrh, the high dry regions of the West and Southwest are preferable to Florida which is lowland surrounded by the sea. Arizona and New Mexico are the hot, dry states recommended, while Colorado is cold dry. The mountains of North Carolina and the Adirondacks of New York are also favorite resorts of consumptives. Asheville is in the center of the North Carolina region.

E. M. W., Oakland, Cal.—The tobacco chewer, unless he grossly overdoes it, is not likely to harm himself nearly as much as he must disgust his friends, at least his women friends. There are various "cures" for the tobacco habit, but the surest cure is for the chewer to stop it and stay stopped, even though he must fight the devil for months.

S. W. T., Antioch, W. Va.—If your doctor prescribed iron, take it as he prescribed it and don't try doctoring yourself with patent medicines you know nothing about. The doctor knows better than you do what is needed in your case. Why go to a doctor, if you know better than he does how to treat yourself? The worst part of it is that there are thousands of just such patients as you are and still they complain because the doctors don't do them any good.

Mrs. T. L., Mt. Auburn, Iowa.—Relief is about the best that can be done for neuralgia. It is not a definite and distinct disease, but a symptom of various disorders of organs and nerves and these must be cured if the neuralgia is to be prevented.

Mrs. J. F. T., Elkton, Va.—Rheumatism is as yet beyond the control of medical science, but there are temporary remedies and if you could go to Hot Springs you might get great relief, as thousands of sufferers have done. We can not say positively that you would be benefited, but we would recommend that you give the Springs a trial, if you can afford to do so.

Premium No. 7291

Given To You If You Will Accept Special Offer Below

Large Handsome Lace Valentines, Dainty Novelty Cut Outs, Cupids, Hearts, Folders, Turnover Cards and a Splendid Assortment of Lovely Gold and Color Embossed Valentine Post Cards!

The Largest and Choicest Collection Of Up-to-date High-Grade Valentine Novelties Ever Offered For So Small An Effort!

WE realize that it is hard for most of our readers to secure the latest up-to-date Valentine novelties as generally they are found only in the stores of the large cities. So we have had made up for us at a great bargain by one of the big manufacturers a large special assortment of these latest style Valentines, Cards and Novelties including a number of exclusive designs which cannot be obtained in the stores or anywhere except from us. Best of all we will give you the whole collection entirely free of expense and as it is so large and contains so many different articles you will be able to sell quite a lot of them to your friends and still have enough left for your own use. Just see what this big assortment contains:

1 Large Lace Monitor Top Two Leaf Valentine Folder in a pretty heart and flower embossed Valentine envelope, 1 large Lace Periscope Heart Canopy Two Leaf Folder in envelope, 1 large Novelty Card Lace Pergola Valentine in envelope. 1 Magic Turnover Valentine, 2 Pretty Heart Folding Valentines, 4 Assorted Valentine Novelty Cut Outs, 2 Juvenile Valentine Hearts, 1 Handsome Embossed Valentine Folder, 1 Embossed Flower, Heart and Cupid Panel Valentine Bookmark, 5 Beautiful Gold And Color Embossed Valentine Post Cards.

February 14 is considered as St. Valentine's Day although Valentines are sent all through the month. It is a beautiful custom that appeals to all both young and old—the exchange of these sentiments of friendship, affection and love, these tender Cupid dart missives between husband and wife, sweethearts, near and dear friends and relatives, and of course, the school children like to exchange with their little friends these dainty love tokens beginning on the fourteenth of February, the month when birds are supposed to choose their mates. Most of the schools now have Valentine Boxes in which the children drop their Valentines to be distributed later in the day, an hour or more being set apart by the teacher for that purpose. And not only the children but the older people as well still are keeping alive the spirit of youth by sending on St. Valentine's Day some appropriate token of remembrance to husband, wife, sweetheart or friend.

The befrilled and lacy cards with raised cupids and crimson hearts of which a fine assortment is included in this collection have been used much of late but the prettier and more original style of full lace Valentines are returning more in favor each year. We give you several special exclusive designs of the most beautiful lace Valentines obtainable, also the new Novelty Cards which are cut out by a specially constructed die of a very unique pattern.

Our illustration gives you a very fair idea as to what you may expect as regards quantity but it falls far short of showing you the size and quality of the different cards, novelties, etc. The large beautiful lace Valentine is actually 6 inches long and nearly 5 inches wide, of the well-known Monitor top pattern of pretty and fine lace work raised two inches on an accordion plaited standard with a heart and gold decorated base and a charming illustrated sentiment of verse on the inside.

Two other handsome lace Valentines are also exclusive designs made expressly for us—one of them a dainty lace pattern on an embossed card over 6 inches long and nearly 3½ inches wide, over the pretty face of a young maiden thus giving the fine Pergola effect so popular in the olden days. The other is a pretty periscope heart-shaped canopy of elevated lace paper on a background on which is shown standing a childish figure and on the inside you find an illustrated verse of proper sentiment. A most pleasing novelty is the magic Turnover Valentine which first appears to be an ordinary folder, then presto—a flip of the finger and it unfolds and shows a smiling little girl sitting on a stile and an expectant youth standing at a short distance, all of this being handsomely printed in colors with an appropriate verse underneath. This also makes a very handsome mantelpiece ornament as it is quite large and stands without support.

In addition to these very latest Novelty Valentines which we have taken pains to describe so that you will understand something of their real beauty and attractiveness, we also include in this remarkable collection two very pretty embossed heart-shaped folders with verse inside, four choice assorted Valentine Novelty Cut Outs of little children, two red and gold illustrated and inscribed Valentine Hearts, one beautiful embossed Cupid and Heart Floral Bookmark, printed in bright colors on a tinted background and five handsome Valentine Post Cards embossed in gold and many bright colors showing flowers and children at play each having the proper sentiment expressed by an appropriate verse underneath.

Thousands of our readers are going to send for this fine large Valentine assortment of the latest and prettiest Valentine Cards and Novelties and although we have a large supply yet we fear we have not enough to go around so take no chances of being disappointed but send in your order at once. You will be simply delighted with what you get and you will say that they are the prettiest, most original Valentine Novelties you ever saw. You may not be able to use all of them yourself but you can easily sell some of them or maybe you had rather give them to some member of your family, or to your friends or keep them until next year.

We will send you this big Valentine collection all packed in a neat tasty envelope free and postpaid if you will accept our special offer printed below. Be sure to send in your order early so as to get it in time for St. Valentine's Day.

Will Cost You No Money!

Children's Happy Hour

Dorothy's Forest Friends

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

ALL the neighbors like Dorothy because she is sweet and kind and not a bit saucy. She loves to help others and particularly an old lady who lives in a lonely little cabin not far from the main road. There is a small strip of woods to go through before reaching the cabin and, when Dorothy is traveling alone, she runs along quickly so the squirrels and chipmunks will not take the good things she is bringing to the poor woman.

Not long ago, while hurrying under the trees with a nice basket of lunch, she tripped on a vine and fell. More stunned than hurt, she lay there for quite a while and, strange to say, fell fast asleep. When she awoke the food had all been eaten by the hungry birds and animals and it was quite dark.

"Mamma, mamma," cried Dorothy, in alarm.

Nearby was a little garden she had planted herself and the flowers growing there tried to comfort her. A pretty chrysanthemum said:

"Tell me your trouble, little girl and perhaps I can help you."

"Dorothy's dress was badly torn and she sobbed out the story of her fall and how she was to go away with her folks and now could not go because her best dress was ruined and she was too poor to get another for many weeks to come.

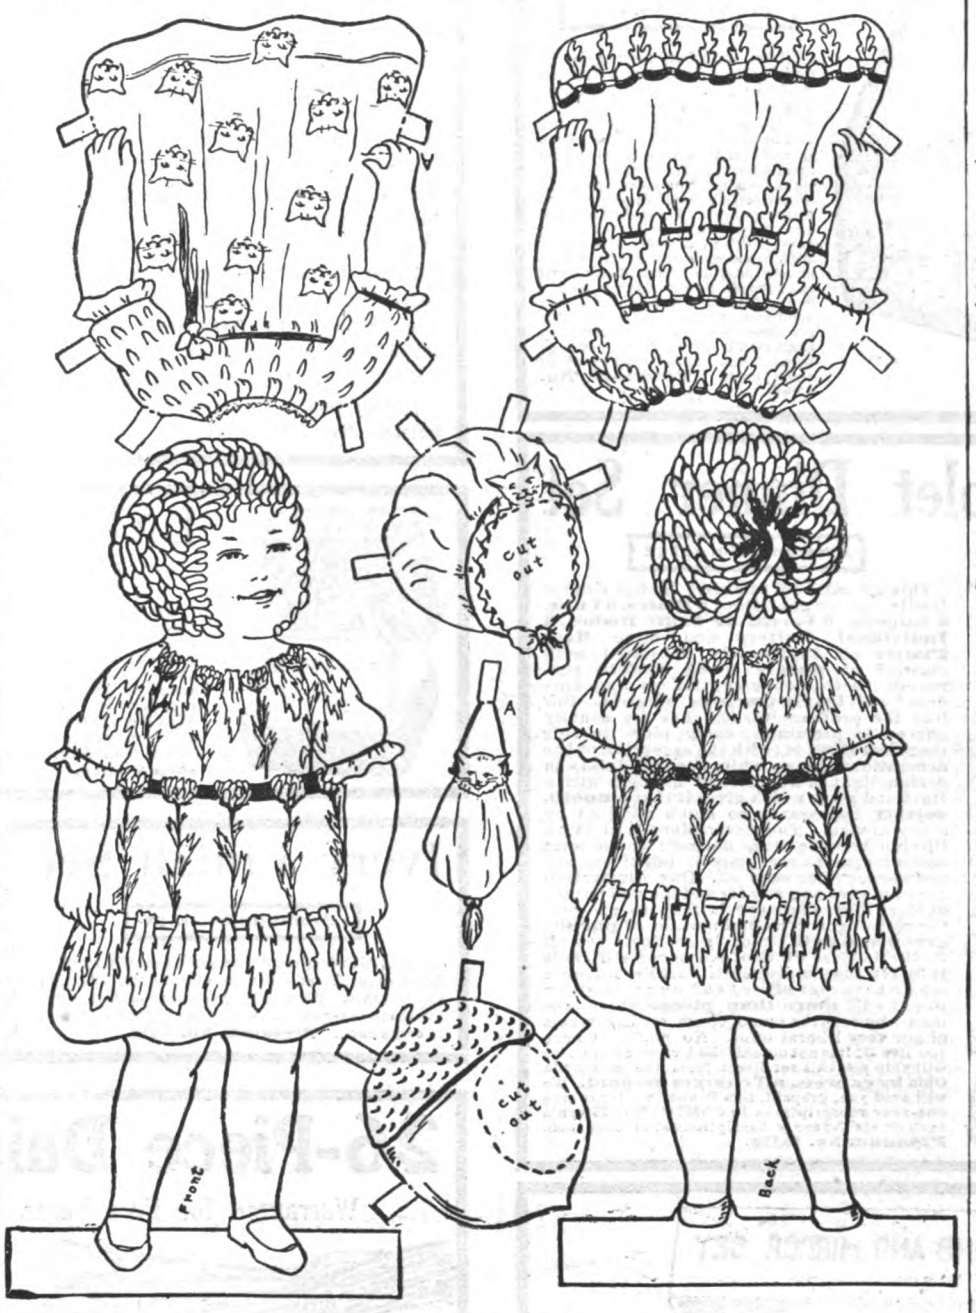
Now the tall chrysanthemum wanted to help Dorothy but she could not make a dress alone, so she called out: "Flowers, attention; all you who wish to help this good, little girl, nod your heads and say, 'I do.'"

In less than a second, every flower bent low and whispered, "I do."

The tall one gathered her sisters together and made the chrysanthemum dress you see Dorothy wearing in the picture.

The oak leaves and acorns had been watching and listening and now they called out: "Oh, please Miss Chrysanthemum, make us into a dress for Dorothy! We love her, too."

With rare skill, the seamstress wove them into the pretty gown you see in the right-hand corner.



"Meow, meow, I want to help too," wailed a kitten that our little friend had been kind to on several occasions.

All the woods people laughed, but the wise chrysanthemum chided them and said: "No one who wants to be kind shall be disappointed. I will paint kitty's picture many times for the trimmings of a dress and Dorothy can carry her home in a hand bag."

Dorothy thought the pussy dress was the cutest of all but she was sad because it was late and she had to bid Miss Chrysanthemum good by. Really, it would be lonely for the flower, for all her sisters were on the dress and would soon be gone.

For quite a while they stood facing each other, unwilling to part, then suddenly, Miss Chrysanthemum brightened up and said: "I will be your bonnet dear, if I may?"

Reaching up, she fitted her petals prettily about Dorothy's head, and then as the happy child turned to go home, who was standing there, but her own darling mother. In a second our little friend was safe in her mamma's arms telling her of the wonderful clothes provided by her forest friends.

Cut-Out Doll Directions

Paste the entire picture on a piece of cardboard (using boiled flour paste) and smooth, with the hands from the center towards the edges. Put it in a large book to dry and let it remain there at least three hours. Cut out each doll, dress, hat and other articles with scissors and color them with crayons, chalk or water colors. This is a double doll. It has a front and a back. Paste the front and back parts together to form one figure. To put the dresses on, bend back the little flaps. The flap "A" on the pussy handbag fits into a slot "A" on the dotted line near child's hand on the pussy dress. To put the hats on, cut out the central portion, inside the dotted line and hold them to the head by bending back the little flaps. To make the doll stand alone, bend back the base strips near the ends to form corners or angles.

Whiskey's Decreasing Tax on Thrift

Whatever may be the consensus of opinion as to the necessity for and desirability of alcoholic liquors as beverages, no thinking man will deny that drinking is an expensive habit, costly both to the individual and to the State. A dollar can be spent quicker and with less to show for it at the bar than in any other way, and the man who is a "good spender" and keeps pace with the crowd around the social glass must keep a pace that kills.

Of late years the production and consumption of liquors and beer has increased enormously, and from observation one would conclude that everybody drinks a little and most people too much. The resultant evils are widespread and far-reaching, even to the third and fourth generation, for the cost does not end with the waiter's check, but with the bills for police, almshouses, prisons and Potter's fields.

The man who indulges this habit must realize that he is putting a self-imposed tax upon his thrift, as well as a tax upon his energies. Of what avail to work hard and then spend to no useful end? Why work for the man who stands behind the bar? Why spend a day's wages in half an hour and get nothing for it but a thrill? If the State should put the same tax upon his income that he puts upon himself, he would rebel. Then, too, he who spends his money thus must realize that he is simply putting money in the bank for the other fellow. It may take a circuitous route to get there, but eventually it will find lodgment in some bank, where it will work for somebody, perhaps harder than he worked for it. And the easiest way to get it in a bank quick—to the other fellow's account—is to buy the drinks for the crowd.

Cheering news along this line comes from Government reports on the consumption of liquor for recent years. Alcohol is lessening its tax upon thrift. The consumption of liquor in 1913 was 143,220,056 gallons. In 1914 it was 139,138,501 gallons, while in 1915 it was 125,155,178 gallons, a net decrease of 18 million gallons in two years. Likewise in the matter of tobacco. In 1915 we burned up six hundred million less cigars than heretofore in a single year, and the Government's tobacco revenues decreased $2,500,000. One hundred and eight distilleries went out of business in 1915 and forty-one breweries ceased to brew. Forty per cent of our Government revenues have been derived from liquor taxes, and in 1915 these revenues fell off over twenty-two million dollars.

Whatever may be the cause for this commendable showing—whether because of the thoughts of war and what it might mean, or whether as a people we are beginning to realize that this is a tax; or whether it is because in many places you can't get a lawful drink, the fact remains that we are drinking less and saving more.

Whether a man figures that drinking is expensive, or harmful, matters little as long as he stops. This conclusion is very apt to fatten his pocketbook somewhat and pad his pay envelope and make him a better citizen. When he concludes that indulgence in any form of extravagance can get him nowhere but downwards, and thrift will surely get him upwards, he has chosen well: for thrift consists not only in doing some things, but refraining from doing others, the chief of which is that habit which takes your all and gives nothing in return but regret, and regrets are costly emotions.

Inasmuch as it is one of the principal missions of COMFORT to aid in upbuilding and upholding the sanctity of the home, no advice will be given on matters pertaining to divorce. Any paid-up subscriber to COMFORT is welcome to submit inquiries, which, so far as possible, will be answered in this department. If any reader, other than a subscriber, wishes to take advantage of this privilege, it may be done by sending twenty-five (25) cents, in silver or stamps, for a one-year subscription to COMFORT thus obtaining all the benefits which our subscribers enjoy including a copy of the magazine for one full year.

Full names and addresses must be signed by all persons seeking advice in this column but not for publication. Unless otherwise requested, initials only will be published.

M. S., New Mexico.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the separate property of the husband is not chargeable with the debts of the wife contracted before marriage.

B. T., Mass.—I think that if your friend procured the one hundred dollars from you for stock of some company which he has been unable to give you, you are entitled to the return of the one hundred-dollar check you paid him and also to the return of the subscription for the stock which you say you signed and gave him.

Mrs. S. F., Ala.—Under the laws of your state, I am of the opinion, that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving a widow and more than four children, his widow would receive a dower of a third interest for life in his real estate and one fifth of his personal property after payment of debts and administration expenses absolutely, the remainder of the estate going in equal shares to his children, the descendants of any deceased child taking their parent's share, so that upon the death of the man you mention who left eleven children, if the son who died pre-deceased his father and his father left no will, his children would receive his portion of his father's estate, which in other words would mean that each child, if he left three, would be entitled to one third of their father's share, but that if, on the other hand, he survived his father, and neither left a will, his share of his father's property, would be divided under the law as his estate and his widow would come into her share which, of course, would be dower of one third interest for life in his share of the real property and in case there were only three children, she would receive absolutely a child's part in the personal property which in this case would be one quarter of her husband's share from his father's estate. The distribution of this personal property being different under the laws of your state, where the decedent leaves only three children, from what would be the case in the father's estate where he left eleven children. Of course, in case of a will, the property would go according to the terms of the will, if the same were a valid will.

Mrs. A. E. McC., Wash.—Under the laws of your state, I am of the opinion, that all property, both real and personal, owned by the wife before marriage and that acquired afterwards by gift, devise or descent is her separate property and that she can dispose of same without the consent of the husband. I think that in the case you mention, if the property was bought thirty-five years ago and deeded to the father of the wife and afterwards devised to her by her father and that if this took place a long period of years ago, her husband would now have great difficulty in establishing an oral agreement made at the time of purchase with the wife's father, that the husband should have a privilege of repurchasing the property from him, provided, of course, no steps have ever been taken in this long period of years to carry out such agreement. I think it possible that the lawyer who you say advised this husband that he had an interest in this property, was thinking of such community property as this husband and wife may own, and, of course, as to that the husband would be entitled to his community interest in same, but I do not think that this rule would hold as to the separate property as above defined belonging to the wife.

Mrs. N. DeV., Oregon.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a surviving widow and children as his heirs at law and next of kin, his widow would receive dower of a one half interest for life in his real estate, and one half of the personal property absolutely after payment of debts and expenses of administration, the balance going in equal shares to the children; we do not think the minor heirs could give a good deed or convey good title to their share in the estate without the proper court proceeding being had for the purpose of disposing of their property; we think unless there is some other objection, it would be more economical to wait until all the heirs become of age before disposing of the property, provided, of course, you will not have to wait too long.

Mrs. M. C. C., Wisconsin.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that any married woman may receive real or personal property by inheritance, nor by gift, grant, devise or bequest from any person, and to hold to her sole and separate use and convey and devise the same.

A. M. P., Maine.—Under the laws of Massachusetts we are of the opinion that upon the death of a man or woman, leaving no will, and leaving no husband, widow, parent, descendant, brother or sister the estate would go to the issue of brothers and sisters in equal shares if they are all in the same degree of kindred, otherwise by right of representation.

Mrs. M. T. G., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that legally adopted children have the same rights of inheritance as the other children of their foster parents; that children can be disinherited by will, but that under the community system which prevails in your state neither husband or wife can dispose of more than one half of the community property; we think that upon the death of either the husband or wife one half of the common property goes to the survivor and the remainder to the child or children of the deceased. We think under the laws of your state, upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a widow and children, his property, other than community property, would go one third of the personal property absolutely, and one third of the real estate for life to the widow, and the balance in equal shares to his children.

Mrs. J. L. Y. Missouri.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the time, within which to bring an action in ejectment for real estate, is limited to ten years.

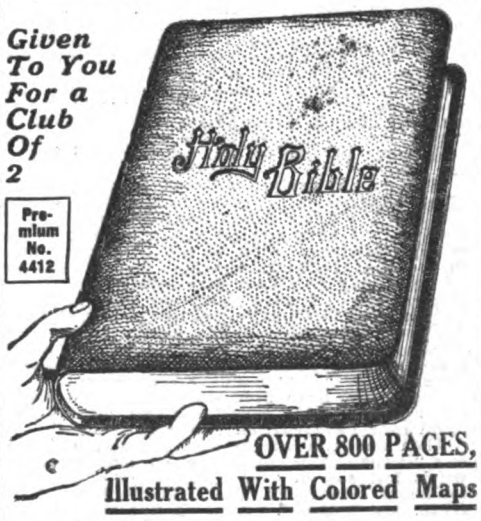
Mrs. J. J., Iowa.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that in the absence of a will, a daughter-in-law would have no interest in the estate of a parent of her deceased husband.

E. N., Nebraska.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that your sister had a legal right to leave her property by will to the institution you mention, provided she possessed testamentary capacity and no undue influence was exercised upon her.

Mrs. A. E. H., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that the signature of the husband is necessary to the conveyance of his interest in the real estate belonging to his wife. We think this would apply to either a mortgage or deed.

E. M., Michigan.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a married man cannot disinherit his wife by will, and that she has the right of election to either take the share allowed her by the terms of the will or to take the share allowed her by statute.

Married Woman, Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that all property acquired by owner's title during marriage becomes the community property of the husband and wife, and during the marriage may be disposed of by the husband without the consent of the wife, and that upon the death of either, without a will, one half of such community property goes to the survivor, and the remainder to the child or children of the deceased. We think that in case of the separation of the husband and wife the court, before which the matter comes, exercises very general jurisdiction over the property and children.



Mrs. M. S., Missouri.—In the absence of a will, we do not think that the divorce of the parents in any way affects the inheritance rights of the children.

Mrs. L. M. B., Colo.—Under the laws of your state I am of the opinion that an exemption is allowed to a debtor who is the head of a family or his wife of sixty per cent of all wages or earnings when such family resides in the state and is depended in whole or in part upon such earnings and all wages are exempt when they do not exceed five dollars per week. I think from your statements, that you should be able to compromise the claim you mention.

L. M., Ala.—You do not supply me with enough infomation for me to form an opinion as to just what would be necessary for you to sell the goods you mentioned. I do not think that you have any legal right to sell a patented article as your own composition, without procuring the right from the person or persons owning the patent. I think also that before selling drug articles, it is necessary to comply with the conditions of the Pure Food and Drug Act of the United States government in regard to labelling same. Of course, if you are simply a distributor of these goods, such law may have been complied with by the manufacturer. I think also that there are many laws restricting the sale of drugs containing some ingredients, and I can form no opinion as to your right to sell the drugs you mentioned without any knowledge as to what such goods are, as you must understand that the sale of poisons and narcotics is much restricted by law.

Mrs. C. A. P., Mont.—Under the laws of your state, I am of the opinion, that if upon the proper showing you can establish that you did not leave or abandon your husband except for good cause, you would be entitled to support from him. I think that the custody of the children in case of the separation of parents, is a question for the court before which such an action might come to decide. I think that a husband can bar by will his wife from all interest in his estate upon his death, except dower of one third interest for life, and that he can disinhert his child by will, if he so elects. I do not think that a husband can be compelled to support his wife living separate or apart from him, unless she leaves him for some good cause. She would, of course, be entitled to support from him if he deserted her without a good cause.

New Non-leakable SAFETY FOUNTAIN PEN

Of Solid 14K Gold Finished With An

IRIDIUM POINT

Premium No. 2344

The cut shows the pen in the exact size when opened and ready for use. The larger cap unscrews and when the pen is encased into its smallest compass it measures only four inches in length. By a late patented device it is an utter impossibility for there to be any leaking of ink and it is so constructed as to be carried in any position, either in a pocket of a coat or vest or in a lady's handbag or valise without the misfortune of spoiling valuable contents or garments by daubing them all over with ink.

The ink bottles are fast being discarded. It is so much more handy to use a fountain pen than the old-fashioned penholder and bottle of ink which is either being constantly tipped over and spilled or frozen. Now all women in their homes, teachers and children at school, lawyers, doctors, clerks and persons in all walks of life prefer to have a bottle of ink always on tap in the shape of a good, reliable Fountain Pen. These Pens will always be found in unleakable, workable condition.

While the entire article is the petite size, it holds enough ink to write a lot of letters and does not have to be refilled for a long time. The holder is hand turned and made from the finest rubber and with its wavy lines of embossed engraving makes a beautiful appearance. Heretofore first-class fountain pens have sold for several dollars each, but this pen is made by a very large manufacturing concern who are anxious to introduce every new working principle to COMFORT readers, and have made up a quantity at a remarkably low rate.

If you have been disappointed in previous fountain pens you may have owned or have been thinking of trying this handy way of using pen and ink, don't fail to take advantage of this offer.

Club Offer. For four one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or two 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send this Safety Pen, including a Glass Filler with rubber bulb, and directions packed in sliding case box, free by parcel post prepaid. Premium No. 2344.

Tons of Rust

When you see a coat of rust on a tool you can conclude that it has begun to oxidize or go back to the original form in which it was dug from the earth. In a few years a bar of iron will disintegrate and becomes iron ore again. The finest steel implements will do likewise, and because of this fact, we are unable to decide whether or not ancient races were iron producers. If they did leave articles of this material, they would long ago have returned to earth again. A prominent engineer of a leading railway system estimaes the daily loss of his company, by rust alone, as eighteen tons. Wherever possible, metal surfaces are covered with suitable paint, and this is no small item either, the cost of painting one large bridge, being ten thousand dollars a year. On the famous Brooklyn bridge, a corps of painters work every day in the year, for when they reach one end, the other is in need of repainting. It will be a boon to mankind when some patient scientist succeeds in producing a non-rusting iron.

When Thomas Haines Understood

By Ellen Gray

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

RACHEL HAINES was dead. Her husband, looking down at her as she lay in placid repose in her coffin, could scarcely realize that she was more than sleeping—her posture was so like that she had always assumed while taking her Sunday afternoon nap on the parlor couch. She had been an orderly woman, doing her housework in a quiet, capable manner, and even taking her rest so.

"She had no thought beyond her family and her work," her husband mused, as he stood stroking his beard and scanning her features for the last time.

Village custom decreed that the bereaved husband or wife should spend a half hour or so alone with the dead before the funeral, and Thomas Haines, with a mental shrug, had complied with the custom. Already he felt bored. At her best, he had never considered Rachel brilliant company, and alone with her now he felt a sort of vague pity for her—a pity for her dullness and her humdrum life.

"She was too good to ever have much fun," he thought. "It's funny how this world seems to be made for the jolly, care-free sort. Now, there's Joan Hammond——" With a bound of relief his mind leaped from the contemplation of Rachel Haines' colorless past to the brilliant present and future of sprightly Joan Hammond. She it was who presided over the village millinery store. Joan was a large, fresh-faced, crinkly haired woman of forty or thereabouts, with a jolly laugh, and blue eyes that could sparkle joyously at a well-put gibe and flash ominously at a too broad compliment. Since she had dropped into the village some five years before, she had been an enigma to Thomas Haines with her hearty laugh and undisguised fondness for masculine company, coupled as they were with her unimpeachable reputation for modesty and virtue. That a woman could be a jolly companion and also a virtuous woman was a great surprise to Thomas, who had known only two classes of women in his life—the quiet, vague, drab-lived matrons like his wife and a remarkably large number of the ladies of shady reputation, whose acquaintance he had made notwithstanding his marital bonds. As he thought of these latter he almost squirmed, then gave himself a mental shake as he thought:

"Why should I bother my head about what's past and gone Rachel, poor soul, was far too slow to ever learn of any of my escapades. Now, if she had been like Joan——" But he refused to think further of independent, clear-sighted Joan. Somehow it seemed not quite decent to think so well of Joan in the presence of his dead wife—a tribute he had not paid her while alive. At the same time he knew in the back of his mind that he would devise every scheme possible to foil his well-meaning nieces who were determined he should make his home with them. Instead, he would move his belongings to the inn where Joan also resided, and so be near her at least three times a day. Not that he ha any serious idea of marrying Joan. He must investigate her character more thoroughly before deciding about that, for this little, grizzly-faced roue, with his back bent from carrying his carpenter's tools, was most particular about the antecedents of the woman who should take his name. Still, the task of investigation promised to be a pleasing one, and the coming years spread themselves out in delightful perspective before his inner vision.

The creaking of the door brought him out of his day-dream, and there came into the room a wrinkled sour-visaged, little old woman, a cousin of Rachel's, who advanced toward him with something white in her outstretched hand.

"She left it fur you," she said, and started out.

"Who?" asked Thomas, with dazed thoughts still running on Joan.

"Her," laconically replied the old woman, pointing to the silent form in the casket. Then she closed the door, leaving Thomas with a sealed letter in his hand.

"Some little love token, I suppose," he thought, as he broke the seal. "She used always to be putting little notes into my pocket when we were first married, and she even sent me valentines and funny little verses through the mail. She was such a chirky little girl when I married her, it's a pity she should have allowed herself to change so."

He moved nearer the light, for her writing was uneven and dim.

"Dear Thomas," he read. "I have had some things to say to you for several years, but thought you'd be more forgiving if you didn't hear them until after I was dead."

"Forgiving," ejaculated Thomas Haines, as he grasped the sheet more closely. "What on earth should I forgive her for? Some little fancied wrong she had done, I suppose."

"I never meant to do you any harm," the letter went on. "That is, I never meant people to know I cared for him, and especially when he was one of your friends. Of course, I knew it was wrong to love another man——"

"God," cried Thomas Haines.

"But he was kind and good to me, and sort of made up for the things I missed in you. We were very careful about showing our love for each other——"

"Oh, you unspeakable thing," breathed Thomas.

—"and I don't think more than half-a-dozen people in town know of it, and they are all such good friends I don't think they'll ever tell. I guess I can't hardly ask you to forgive me, but I wanted you to know what I have been doing. I had intended telling you the man's name, but I think I'd better not, for he is one of your friends, and you might do something rash."

"'Something rash,' I guess I would do something rash," raged Thomas. "I'd have killed him like the dog that he is, and her along with him. Oh, God, don't let me look at her, or I'll be tempted to curse the dead."

For minutes—it seemed hours to him—the little man raged and fumed. He was like a maniac, and yet with it all he remembered not to make any demonstration that would call in the neighbors and relatives in the adjoining room. He now felt that they knew his shame—had known it, perhaps, for years, and all of the time he had supposed them to be pitying Rachel for having so gay a spouse, instead they had been secretly pitying him for his wife's amours with one of his friends.

"God in Heaven, why are such women allowed to cumber the earth?" he wondered. He hated every woman that had ever lived. He tried to recall the looks and tones of his acquaintances when they had spoken to Rachel in the past, but his brain seemed too numb to perform the task. He had sometimes worried for fear she might be hurt by some stray gossip regarding himself, when he should have been investigating her own behavior.

She had said one of his friends was the man. Which one could it be? He would be suspicious of all until he had ferreted out the culprit. He would not dare make any inquiries of any of them, for he might be speaking to the traitor himself. But surely, in some way, God—a God whose especial duty it was to reveal the way of revenge to a righteously angry husband—would point out the guilty man. And then, so he swore with a mighty oath, there should be an accounting. No man could drag his name through the mire unpunished. He cared not what punishment he might receive for his deed. To be in prison would be a relief. Then none of the villagers could see him and gloat over his misfortune. He dreaded their eyes more than anything else. He wished he might stay in this room forever. He felt that outside there were eyes, eyes everywhere—some mocking, some inquisitive, and some sympathetic. For some unexplainable reason, he dreaded the sympathetic ones more than any other.

He shrank as he heard each tiny noise in the outer room. Merciful Heavens! to think that he, who had gone his way so care-free all these years should have been forced to bear this agony. He crouched in his corner, a desperate, frenzied man.

Quietly the door began to open. Thomas pressed a shaking hand to his mouth to hold back the shriek of outraged nerves that threatened to break forth. Then he saw that it was the old cousin again. With all of the strength of his will he forced himself to remain in his chair instead of flying at her throat. "The old she-devil," he muttered in his beard. "She's come to gloat over me, I warrant she knew every thing. If I find she helped them in their sin, so help me, she'll pay for it."

The old woman shuffled a step or two from the threshold, peering into the gloom with her bleared old eyes. Then she spoke.

"Here's another letter fur you," she said, and laid it on a convenient chair. "Dinner'll be ready in a half hour," she added as she closed the door.

Food, ugh, the thought was deadly repulsive to him. He could never eat in the presence of those peering, inquisitive eyes. In fact, he could think of no place in the village where he might enjoy himself again. There was the Red Men's lodge, one of whose offices he held—he could never preside there again. There was the fishing club composed of old cronies who spent many happy summer days on the banks of neighboring streams. He would never join them again. And all because he had married a woman who was unworthy.

Now he thought of the second letter. Who could it be from? Some relative sending condolences, he supposed. He forced himself to pick it up. Then almost dropped it when he saw it was also addressed in his wife's handwriting with a large figure 2 underneath his name. He wished to tear it into a thousand pieces but restrained himself when he realized that perhaps herein lay the key to the mystery. With palsied hands he tore off the envelope and opened the letter.

Without any preface it bounded into the midst of his trouble: "I am going to tell Anne to give you the first letter a half hour before this one," he read. "I have marked this one No. 2 so she couldn't mistake. First of all, Thomas, I want to say that I lied in the first one. It was the first and only lie I have ever told you in all our married life. I have never, so help me, God, wronged you in thought, word or action since we have been married——" The sheets slipped from Thomas' cold fingers. His brain refused to understand this positive denial of her positive statement of a few minutes previous.

"She must have been demented," was all he could think. "No woman in her right senses could ever have written two such letters."

Then he gathered the sheets again, and read on: "Perhaps you can't believe me at first," his wife's letter said. "For I suppose my first letter about crazed you. But I am telling you the truth, my husband. And when I tell you my purpose for giving you this terrible hurt, maybe you will be angrier than ever. Yet I hardly think so, Thomas. I only wanted to give you a taste of what I've been enduring for twenty years. Don't, don't get angry now until I tell you why I have done this. My motive is not revenge, believe me. Perhaps you thought I never knew when you were untrue to me. I hope you thought me too dull to understand, but, oh, my God, I understood all too well. I knew every time you were unfaithful. I knew each one of your loves. And, oh, I knew that people knew. Their silly sympathetic looks stabbed me to the heart. Why, why couldn't you see this, Thomas? Haven't you seen me gradually drop out of church work and all such things I have always loved so well? And didn't you ever notice how, between your attachments for these women, I always brightened up? I even started into some of my old church work a time or two, but I always dropped out, for in a few months their looks would be pitying me again. Pity is a hard thing to bear."

"I know, I know," murmured Thomas Haines.

"I suppose you wonder why I didn't tell you some of this while alive, and urge you to give it all up. Oh, my man, don't you know it would have been useless? Can't you see how furious you would have been, and how you would have pursued the same course as usual, a little more secretly, perhaps, but still the same course? When I am gone you will forgive me so much more than while I am with you. That is why I dared write that first lying letter. I wanted you to suffer only one half hour. That isn't too long a time when you think of my days and months, is it, dear? And although I am human enough to really wish you to suffer that half hour, yet it wasn't for that alone I wrote the lie. It is hard for me to tell you my reason for doing all this. I have never preached during all our life together, have I, dear? And I don't know how to begin now that I am going to leave you.

"But it is something like this: I do want you to be with me wherever I may be—not that I'm sure of going to Heaven, for I've had so many bitter thoughts in the past few years I can't feel sure of anything. But somehow I have a feeling that if you loved me the last years of your life and remained true to me as I have done to you all my life, that surely God would let us be together during the years to come, and that would be Heaven to me, even if it chanced to be in the deepest depths of hell.

"You remember, dear, when we were young, how every one used to laugh when I'd slip the cake or candy in my pocket at a party, to bring home to share with you? It tasted so much better than way. And do you remember, Thomas, how I'd burden you with my troubles, too? If any one had hurt my feelings, or I'd made a mistake in my sewing, or if the jelly had boiled over on my clean floor, I'd run to meet you in the evening, and pour out my troubles to you and then forget them immediately? It seems I always wanted to share good and bad with you as long as I felt you cared for me, and oh, how I want to share the future with you. Heaven can't be Heaven without you, and I can't be terrified at the thought of the other place if only you were with me and loving me. I'm sadly afraid I have not made myself plain to you, dear man, for it's hard to express myself after such a long silence.

"But, perhaps, you'll understand. I pray God you may. Your wife, RACHEL."

At the funeral the villagers were amazed at the change in Thomas Haines. They had expected him to be decently sorrowful, but this grim-faced, hollow-eyed man rather awed them.

"He'll be himself again," commented Jack Barnes, with all of a bachelor's cynicism. "He'll be all right as soon as he gets into line again. He's just trying to realize that he's actually free now."

But in the carriage behind the hearse, Thomas Haines was quietly saying to Amanda, the ultra-respectable niece of his wife: "If you don't mind, Amanda, after everything is over, I believe I'll come to your house to board."

"Why, Uncle Thomas," gasped the startled Amanda. "Of course, you are welcome. Aunt Rachel always wanted me to take care of you after she was gone, but I was afraid I'd have trouble persuading you to do as she wished."

"You might have had at one time," replied Thomas, "but not now. For now I understand."

6 Wheel Chairs in January

388 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The six January wheel chairs go to the following applicants. The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends in their behalf.

H. R. Smith, Yuma, Colo., 210; Millie Catherine Barnes, Columbia, N. C., 140; Mrs. Naomi Moad, Carpenter, Okla., 132; Vernie May Williams, Fairview, Okla., 104; Ben Brown, Grapeland, Texas, 101; Mrs. Thomas B. Christian, Grady, N. M., 100.

H. R. Smith, age 39, is crippled in his lower limbs as a result of the stroke of paralysis suffered four years ago.

Little Millie Barnes, age 6, has been afflicted all her life with spinal trouble, so that she has never been able to stand or walk and has to be cared for like an infant, which severely taxes her mother's strength. Mrs. Barnes writes that she is very desirous of the wheel chair as she expects it will be a great help to her caring for her unfortunate child.

Mrs. Moad, age 53, has obtained nearly all the subscriptions for her chair herself and deserves to be rewarded for her persistent efforts.

Vernie May Williams, age 8, is crippled in her lower limbs by rickets from which she has suffered ever since she was seven months old.

Ben Brown, age 35, is crippled by rheumatism. His legs are drawn up in a sitting position and his arm joints so stiffened that he cannot feed himself. His wife supports the family.

Mrs. Christian, age 28, is crippled by what the doctors call inward goitre which caused her muscles to shrivel until she has so little strength that she is almost helpless. The poor woman is dependent on her husband to lift and carry her about. He is very kind and attentive but, as they can't afford to hire help, she has a hard time when he is at work as he has to be to earn a living. She writes that she will be very glad when she gets the wheel chair which she needs so much.

Now, good friends, open your hearts and do your best to help the other poor shut-ins on our list who are suffering for a wheel chair and are bravely struggling to earn one.

For a cripple to suffer for a wheel chair is a disgrace to the community in which he lives because COMFORT'S Wheel-Chair Club offers the means of obtaining wheel chairs free of expense.

Our Roll of Honor and the touching letters of thanks below will interest you.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 200 new one-year subscriptions to COMFORT sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Subscription price is 25 cents, but if sent in clubs of five or more for the Wheel-Chair Club, I accept them at 20 cents each.

COMFORT'S Wheel Chair a Great Help to Mother in Caring for Her Crippled Boy.

WINSTON-SALEM, N. C.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

I received the wheel chair a few days ago and my son was very much pleased with it. It is a great help to me as he can lie and sit in it and I can easily take him from room to room, and it will be so much help when he is sick. His little six-year-old brother, William Jennings Bryan, who helps take care of him, is highly pleased with the chair and says he loves it. He wheels Jesse about and plays with him. I appreciate the chair so much that I shall get more subscriptions whenever I can so to help other shut-ins to get the chairs they are trying for. With a thankful heart, I remain, Yours truly,

MRS. R. W. BRYAN.

A Much Better Chair than She Expected

LOUISVILLE, MISS.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

The wheel chair came in good condition and I am much pleased with it. It is a much better chair than I had expected it to be. I am still working getting subscriptions so to help others who need wheel chairs. May your good work go on.

Yours truly, MRS. H. J. BALL.

A $1.50 Book Free

Our new Bargain Book pictures over 5000 home things, bought under low-price contracts. Many are pictured in colors. The high cost of paper makes each copy, with mailing, cost us about $1.50. But we send the book free to home lovers.

All these prices, however, expire with our present stocks. New stocks, bought on 1916 contracts, will cost us vastly more. So only a limited number of these books will be issued. And never again will you see home things quoted so low, we believe.

Send the coupon today for this book, to make sure you get it. Your Credit Card will come with it.

Half Prices

Our latest catalog quotes many things at half the current prices. Our savings will average one-third. And we guarantee on everything to undersell any other house.

The reason is, we buy whole factory outputs. We buy for millions of homes, and largely on yearly contracts. Our contracts for goods now on hand were made in 1915, before the enormous 1916 advances. So that saving alone will average one-third under present factory costs. So $1 here, on many things, buys you $2 in present value. The prices we quote will amaze you.

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

President Wilson Puts It Squarely up to Germany to Choose Between Peace and War with United States

BECAUSE of Germany's latest and most intolerable aggression against our national dignity and rights, President Wilson has broken off friendly relations and severed diplomatic intercourse between the United States government and the government of Germany by recalling our ambassador at Berlin and telling the German ambassador at Washington to go home. This is not a declaration of war, but it brings us to the brink of war. It is the last word, the extreme protest short of war, and is almost invariably followed by war which is expected as the probable sequel also in this instance because of the aggravated provocation that compelled the President to this momentous action.

On January 31 Germany announced that after February first her submarines would sink without warning all ships of all nations found traversing certain seas, whatever their cargoes or their destinations and regardless of the fate of their passengers and crews. The zones wherein the Kaiser forbids all ocean travel include the greater part of the Mediterranean Sea and a large area of the North Atlantic extending from Spain northward beyond the Shetland Islands and well up the coast of Norway, and from the coast of continental Europe westward to the twentieth meridian hundreds of miles west of Ireland.

Germany's purpose in so doing is to starve her enemies, France and especially England, to submission; but even for this purpose she has no right to sink ships engaged in peaceful commerce on the high seas and destroy or even imperil the lives of their passengers and crews. All neutral nations, in fact the whole world outside of Germany and her allies, have protested against this action and denounced it as an atrocious and inhuman violation of the rights of humanity.

Since February 1915, when Germany began her submarine campaign, more than two hundred American citizens, including many women and children, and over two thousand citizens of other neutral countries have been killed by the sinking of ships of commerce by German raiders. After repeated protests and warnings by our government, which Germany disregarded, President Wilson, on the eighteenth of April last, gave notice that he would break off diplomatic relations with the German empire altogether unless the German government should immediately declare and effect an abandonment of its "relentless and indiscriminate warfare against vessels of commerce by the use of submarines." In reply the German government gave assurance that it would desist from attacking merchant ships contrary to the rules of war.

This notice from the President is what is called an Ultimatum, meaning a last word or final demand which, if not complied with, will be followed by action without further argument or discussion. Therefore, when Germany made the recent announcement of its intention to resume indiscriminate warfare against freight and passenger ships our government, as President Wilson declared in his address before Congress on February fourth, had "no alternative consistent with the dignity and honor of the United States but to sever all diplomatic relations with the German empire." By an almost unanimous vote Congress approved the President's action and proceeded immediately to consider the measures recommended by him as necessary to prepare for war in case Germany should compel us to defend our rights by force of arms.

Our government has spoken its last word in no uncertain tone and is no longer on speaking terms with the German government. The choice between peace and war with the United States rests with Germany and depends entirely on Germany's action. As the President says, while still hoping for peace every possible effort is being made to prepare for the worst. We are glad to note a general and spontaneous outburst of popular approval of the President's course together with innumerable offers of help, in case of war, from all classes and all sections. Happily the hyphens seem to have disappeared from our citizenship and the nation stands united in its loyal support of the government. Doubtless this resolute demonstration of American patriotism will have a restraining influence on the councils of the war lords in Berlin and a tendency to prevent the commission of the overt act that would plunge us into war. The situation is critical in the extreme, but we still hope for peace with honor.

Home and School Associations

A RECENT bulletin issued by the U. S. Bureau of Education urges closer reciprocal relations and more effective cooperation between home and school. It quotes with approval a communication from Franklin B. Dyer, Superintendent of Public Schools of Boston, Mass., in which he says: "There never was a time when the need was so great for intimate connection between home and school as at present. The conditions of modern life are so complex, opportunities for good and evil are so numerous, the occupations of home are so meager unless they are related to the school, and the work of the school is so abstract unless it has a practical outcome in the home, that it is imperative for parents and teachers to get together."

He asserts that "the training of each must supplement the other. Such cooperation can come about in no other way so well as through organizations that bring parents and teachers into friendly and frequent association." He advises that the citizens in each school district in Boston organize a Home and School Association and appoint a local committee to act as an advisory council in cooperation with the school authorities.

This plan, which Superintendent Dyer recommends for Boston, is similar in purpose to that of the Parent-Teacher Associations which have been organized in many sections and are productive of excellent results wherever they exist. In a previous editorial we pointed out the benefits derived by the schools and the homes, the pupils, parents and teachers through these Parent-Teacher Associations, and again we urge our readers to join such an association, if there is one in their community, and, if not, to organize one at once. The home is the most important institution in this country and the school ranks next. They are the two most potent factors in developing the characters and forming the habits of the rising generation, thus shaping the destiny of the nation, and they must work together in perfect harmony and not, as is sometimes the case, at cross purposes.

National Forest Reserves as Public Play-Grounds and Recreation Resorts

NOT the least important of the many purposes for which the national forest reserves are being utilized is their use as public fishing, camping and recreation grounds and vacation resorts. More and more as the country fills up with the rapid increase of population the beauty spots, and especially the desirable places along the streams, ponds and lakes, are being acquired by the wealthy as sites for summer homes, or are under cultivation as farms whose owners do not welcome the intrusion of picnickers or camping parties on their properties. In some of the older and more densely populated sections there are few if any available places open to the humble citizen of small means who would spend a holiday in the country or a vacation roughing it among the beauties of nature.

Fortunate in this respect are the people who live within easy reach of one of the national forest reserves where the government permits the public, under reasonable and proper regulations, to enjoy an outing to their hearts' content. Roads and trails are being extended so that before long the most remote parts will be accessible to the tourist. Each summer thousands of vacationists in ever increasing numbers avail themselves of the free privilege of camping in the national forests and find health-giving sport and recreation in roaming the woods, fishing the well stocked lakes and ponds that nestle among the tree clad hills and in the limpid streams that meander through the valleys or leap down the mountain sides in sparkling torrents.

Though it is intended that the government shall never part with the ownership and control, those desiring a permanent habitation in which to spend their vacations are permitted to lease cottage lots, at a moderate rental, bordering the shores of some of the lakes, and land may be rented even for hotel purposes to furnish accommodations for wayfarers and tourists of more fastidious tastes. It is of incalculable value to the health and morals of the nation that these sanctuaries of wild nature should be preserved and reserved for the use and benefit of the plain people and not permitted to be monopolized by land grabbers.

Mexicans Raiding Our Border Again

IT is nearly a year since our government despatched an expeditionary force under General Pershing into Mexico with orders to get Villa "dead or alive" because of his atrocious raid on Columbus, N. M., murdering our citizens and burning their homes. Our soldiers were treacherously attacked by Mexican government troops and at the behest of Carranza, Pershing was ordered to halt his pursuit, but while he remained with his troopers on the other side of the border peace and security reigned on our side. He has been recalled in deference to or fear of the despot of Mexico, and Pershing's rear guard is scarcely returned ere the Mexican armed forces resume their murderous raiding on our side of the boundary line killing our citizens, pillaging their property and carrying others captive into Mexico. As our government has taken no action, at this writing, the citizens are organizing a volunteer force to cross over into Mexico and try to rescue their friends from the hands of the Mexican brigands.

Clean Up the Movies

WE are pleased to learn that the board of review, which censors the films, at last has decided not to approve the picturing of any more nude female figures on the screen. One hardly knows whether the audacity of the producers in presenting such indecent pictures or the complacent indulgence of the censors in passing them is the more astonishing. While they are about it they had better go a step or two further in a much needed clean-up of the movies and cut out the numerous plays of immoral tendency, pictures which in their circumstance and action are salacious or of impure suggestion, those which portray drinking and other forms of vice and dissipation in an alluring aspect, or which make a hero of the criminal, cast a glamour over crime or condone unchastity, and among the worst those which teach with technical accuracy of detail the expert methods of perpetrating crime and evading detection.

It used to be the yellow-covered novels or the dime detective stories that had the blame of starting many boys in a career of crime, but the opinion has been stated authoritatively that the movies, by presenting the classes of plays which we have mentioned, are exerting a more baleful influence on youth. A prominent judge gives it as his opinion that the startling increase in the number of youthful lawbreakers is due to the demoralizing influence of the movies. Many of the picture plays have a moral uplift and high educational value—but beware the bad ones.

Cretonne Covered Racks

Covering cabinets or cases with flowered cretonne with a ruffle at the bottom have a dainty look never imparted by paint or enamel. It should never be put on flat like wall paper but rather shirred or ruffled like a curtain. The folds can lay over and conceal the tacks that hold it on. Fig. 1 shows a sewing cabinet made of a soap box. No painting or finishing is needed except the cretonne covering neatly tacked on. Fig. 5 is a bookshelf, curtained in front and cloth covered on top and ends. Fig. 6 shows the simple construction of the shelf and Fig. 7 how it hangs on the wall. Fig. 4 is a little shelf studded with nails that serves as a spool holder. For a bedroom, cretonne covered pieces are tasteful and appropriate. The covering can be washed and replaced any time. A sitting-room or chamber finished with one pattern of goods would be novel and refreshing. Picture frames covered with cretonne are very effective too.

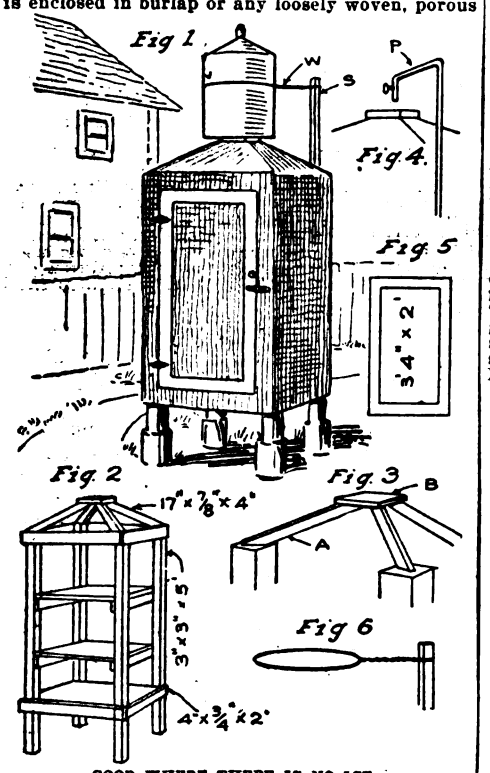
Ventilation



Every day we learn more about the value of fresh air. It is no longer considered necessary to box things up and exclude air to keep them fresh. In fact, the refrigerator, the closet and storeroom and every place where food supplies are kept must have constant ventilation. The picture is a side view of a pantry well supplied with air. "A" is an opening in the foundation, "B" is a hole in the floor screened over as shown in Fig. 2. Over the shelves is a small window. The arrows show the course of the air currents. Entering from the great outdoors, it traverses every part of the cupboard and then flows out the upper window. Remember that nothing ever got musty in the open air, and many a case of typhoid and other diseases can be prevented by ventilating the larder.

FRESH AIR PREVENTS DISEASE.

Iceless Cooler

People who live where it is impossible to get ice will find the accompanying plan a great help in the hot season. Fig 2 shows how a simple set of shelves or cupboard is built. This is enclosed in burlap or any loosely woven, porous material of two or three-ply thickness. It is held by tacks and should be stretched quite taut. The door is a simple frame like Fig. 5, covered with the same kind of cloth. The framework of the roof, as shown in Fig. 3, is designed to shed the rain. It is covered with good roofing material. On the flat part "B" a vessel containing two or three gallons of water is placed. The bottom of the vessel is perforated with needle holes so that the water will leak out and drip evenly down on the four sides. A three gallon tank will require filling once each day. If the cloth is kept reasonably wet so that evaporation is constant, the interior will be cool, even on the hottest day. Aim to have the cooler where a draft or breeze will strike it. The legs set in tin cans which are half full of water. As the refrigerator is placed outdoors, this latter arrangement is a necessary precaution against ants and other crawling things. Of course it should be shaded from the sun. This plan was given me by a lady who used it successfully in the most torrid part of this country and personally I will vouch for the merit it possesses.

GOOD WHERE THERE IS NO ICE.

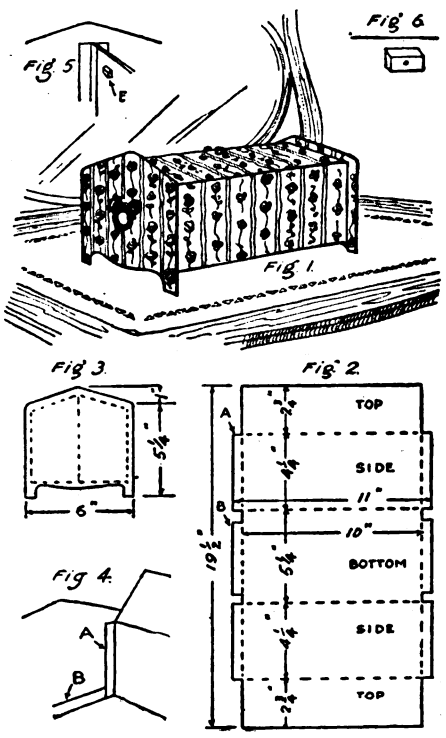
An Attractive Settle



In nearly every home in the land can be found one or more old-fashioned wooden bedsteads, long since unused. Our purpose is to suggest a means of utilizing profitably the waste bed parts that now litter attics and storerooms. The drawing herewith shown is the happiest solution of the question I can devise. A few cuts of the saw, a little nailing and presto, your old bed becomes a neat and comfortable settle. Cut on the dotted lines. The two parts of the tall end of the bedstead forms the back and seat of the bench or settle, and the smaller end divided, gives us two ends for the same.

COZY AND COMFORTABLE.

Dresser Chest

Here is a home-made boudoir article of utility and beauty. It may be used as a hair receiver or a glove or handkerchief box or a receptacle for dainty linens. It is made of heavy cardboard which may be cut in one piece as in Fig. 2. This diagram includes all parts except the ends. At every bend, paste a strip of cloth for reinforcement. The bend itself will run along the center of the strip, which may act also as a hinge for the top piece. The ends are fastened by bending the flaps "A" and "B" and pasting to them, as in Fig. 4. Liquid glue is the best kind of an adhesive to use. It is to be applied with a small paint brush. Before pasting finally you can get an idea of how the box will look by basting the parts together. The finished chest is covered with velvet or cretonne. It is sewed on with thread of a color that makes it practically invisible. Fig. 5 shows how the upright partition is put in the center of the box. "E" is a small piece of cork glued on to act as a stop or rest for the lid. The box makes a pretty gift.

Straining Jelly

Here is a very practical method of arranging chairs and cloth for the purpose of straining fruit pulp in the canning season. The board "C," besides providing a resting place for the granite vessel, tends to hold the chairs firm and stable. The mass of pulp is placed in the familiar sling "A" and will not need any further attention. My mother always lets her jellies strain during the night and in the morning they are usually in just the right condition to be handled. A temporary cover of oilcloth might be placed over the arrangement shown in the picture to prevent dust from settling on the soft mass. Wherever fruit is being handled the floor should be damp enough to absolutely prevent the rising of dust. Wet mopping in the first place and a few sprinklings during the day will bring about this desirable condition. It is said that nearly all the diseases known to man may be contracted by infection from germs that float in the air. It is no unimportant matter, then to try to minimize this constant source of danger.

Reading Chair

You may have a great number of chairs in your home but I doubt if you have one that is used exclusively for reading and writing purposes. There is really a demand for such a chair so I have designed this one to fill the want. I can safely say that it will give satisfaction for I have used one of my own making for several years. Fig. 1 is a front view and Fig. 2 a side view. The arms are very wide so that they can be used to rest the paper on while you write. Under the right arm is a little side drawer used to contain the writing material or the book you are reading. Boards one inch in thickness are used for material. The joint Fig. 3 is used to fasten the front rail to the front legs. The one pictured in Fig. 4 is employed to join the side rails and rear legs. Underneath those rails, boards are nailed to form a seat and a cushion that fits snugly between the square formed by the four rails placed on top. Figs. 6 and 7 show the drawer plan. I used chestnut for my chair. It looks a good deal like oak and may be finished very nicely. If you like this plan, let me know.

FOR READING AND WRITING.

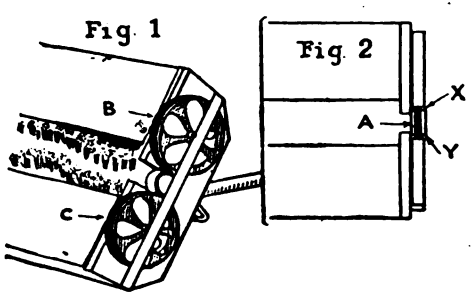
A Fly Trap

In recent times we have come to regard the common housefly as a dangerous menace to health and life. Not only does the fly carry disease germs from infected places but it is a breeding place for the pests. The picture shows a trap made of common wire screen. To a cylinder of this material, add the cones as shown. The flies get inside and cannot get out. Of course there is a hole at the smaller end of each cone. Place the trap where flies are found in great numbers and when it is full hold it over a blaze. It can be used over and over again for a whole season. A door in the top like Fig. 4 permits the inside to be brushed out with a whisk broom. The fastening is done by sewing with a strand of the fine wire.

THEIR DOOM IS CERTAIN.

Window Washer



The device shown in the cut is a three-cornered piece of half inch pine which measured from four to six inches between points. The handle is about eighteen inches long and is screwed on, holes being bored for the screws. Most windows are just high enough to evade the reach of an ordinary person and this tool makes it easy for you to do a good job without taking much risk. Wrap the wash-cloth around it and you can get at the corners nicely. If a piece of rubber is nailed to the edge it will serve as a quick drier, for the rubber drawn downward on the pane of glass will force nearly all the water ahead of it. It is a useful tool and costs nothing but a little time and labor.

WORK MADE LIGHTER.

Mending the Carpet Sweeper

Both the regulation style carpet sweepers and the more modern pneumatic suction sweepers are apt to get worn at the friction surface of the wheels. It is essential that the wheels play against each other rather hard in order that sufficient driving power be developed and their looseness can only be remedied by building out the rim or running surface. A good way to do this is to wrap adhesive tape around either of the large wheels "B" or "C," or the small one between them, marked "A." If the brush of the sweeper does not go around rapidly enough to suit you, try this simple method of repair and you will be agreeably surprised at its restored efficiency.

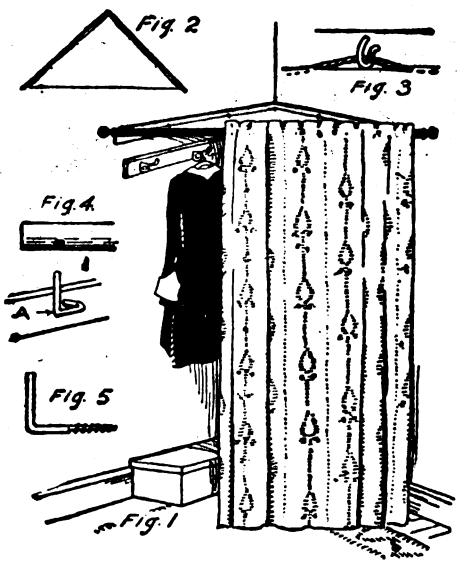
Uses for Felt

Where there are several men in a family, it is surprising what a large number of felt hats will accumulate. The sketches herewith shown are submitted to aid you in using up the old hats. Fig. 1 is an iron holder made of a double thickness of felt. It is a non conductor of heat and does not burn easily and is therefore admirably suited to the purpose named. The next sketch is a round mat for a lamp. Fig. 3 is an insole of felt for baby's shoe, and Fig. 4 is a stove polishing mitten made of two felt layers.



SOME USES FOR OLD FELT.

Fig. 5 is a floor polishing brush made of many thicknesses like the leaves of a book. They are sewed together and tacked to a board which forms the top of the brush and carries two blocks, between which a tiling handle fits. Fig. 6 is a felt substitute for a rubber washer in making small plumbing repairs. Fig. 7 is a window cleaner, "F" is the doubled felt, "B" a wood block, and "C" the beveled strips that hold the felt. Fig. 8 is a box lined with felt. Such a box would be useful for storing or shipping cut glass or jewelry.

A Storage Corner

It takes a pretty large house to afford ample room for everything, but good management solves many a problem of keeping things neat and accessible. The corner arrangement shown herewith is suitable for use in a bedroom that has no closet or one of insufficient size. The curtain pole is supported at each end by a hook bent like "A." A common hook, Fig. 5, is used and may be bent with pliers. If a gimlet hole is bored in the pole to receive the hook a very solid job will be the result. Fig. 2 is a roof for the corner, necessary to keep out dust. It may be bound on the edge with rope which hangs on wall hooks as in Fig. 3. Cretonne or any heavier flowered material will be appropriate for the curtains or an old pair of draperies, which are now out of date, may be utilized to good advantage. The cloth should be fastened in such a way that it will admit of taking down without much trouble, as frequent washing will be desirable.

Nerine's Second Choice

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

John Lispenard, cousin to Kit Belton's mother, marries a Canadian girl. Dying he leaves a widow, two girls, Agatha and Nerine, and one son Maurice. Mrs. Lispenard marries Clarence Mayne, an interloper. At her decease she leaves Clarence Mayne an income until the girls are of age. Lispenard house and money go to the male heir in the direct line. Clarence Mayne goes on a trip to Monte Carlo, Kit Belton comes on a visit, while Maurice Lispenard, denied the education which is his by right, walks from Liverpool, where he is learning to be a mechanical engineer, to be with Kit Belton. Jones, known to Maurice as Lister, is ordered to harness the horses, when they go to see Lord Satterlee in a game of football. Agatha recognizes him. He has attended St. Jude's that he might see her. Maurice invites Lord Satterlee to dine with him. A young maid, not familiar with the house, and suspicious, leaves him in the darkness. He gropes his way to Clarence Mayne's room, where Nerine finds him later. She picks up a fallen table. In a secret drawer she discovers a book with her mother's initials on it.

AGATHA was on her knees saying her prayers. The dim light fell on her bent head and clasped hands as she knelt, and after one look Nerine retreated.

Agatha would never, she knew, get up from her prayers to approve of touching any of Mr. Mayne's possessions!

Nerine returned to her own chamber, got out of her garments and into bed without much ceremony, and set her candle on the small table beside her. In no case was she given to long orisons on her knees, like Agatha; two childish and familiar prayers had served her since first her mother had taught them to her.

Very cautiously she began to examine her treasure trove, when a question from her sister, who stood in the doorway, made her hide it.

"How can you sit up like this in this cold room?"

"I was going to read something," replied Nerine with the calmness of perfect truth.

A few minutes later, when Nerine was convinced that her sister was sound asleep she pulled the candle close to her and with chilly fingers took out her book.

It was old and worn. On the back of it was stamped in letters of faded gold, "Diary." That E. L. of raised silver on the cover meant that it had belonged to Esther Lispenard not to Esther Mayne. Had Mr. Mayne put it in that drawer, she wondered, or had it been there unknown to anyone ever since her dead mother had laid it there?

It was a pretty book, sumptuous in its Russia binding and the heavy silver clasp which resisted her fingers. Nerine gave it an impatient shake. It was ridiculously strong to be only a woman's diary. She looked searchingly at it, and the reason she could not open it became sufficiently plain. Under the silver clasp was a patent steel lock. Nerine gave a jerk of impatience as she shivered in the cold room.

"Why on earth hadn't I the sense to think of looking for a key?" she thought. "Now, heaven only knows when I shall be able to get into that room again."

With a dull disappointment she pushed the book under her pillow. It was not worth while to say anything about it to anyone now; tomorrow she would put it away somewhere and wait in patience till she could come across a key. She was averse to taking it to a locksmith, and she did not like to force it open, as she had a superstitious feeling that it would be wrong to mutilate her dead mother's diary.

The next day dawned dull and unpleasant. The Lispenard household, with the exception of Maurice, arose with a flat "after-the-party" feeling to match the day. Nerine, without a second glance at her stolen book, put it away in her wardrobe under a pile of linen, having no key to turn on it, and went down to breakfast. She felt unsettled; nervous without any reason; the dullness of every-day existence seemed doubly unsatisfactory somehow after last night's dinner with its one guest. Rather lazily she helped Agatha to put away the glass and silver they had had out for the occasion. It had been fun to get it out, but to put it away was servant's work.

Nerine was eager to once more visit Mr. Mayne's room, and she made some excuse to get away from Agatha. She looked into the morning-room as she passed, just to make sure that Maurice and Kit were safe. They apparently were, for they had drawn a table close to the fire and were busy writing letters. As Nerine opened the door their animated conversation stopped abruptly.

"Don't let the fire out, Maurice," she said, giving an idle glance at the table strewn with half-written letters in Maurice's and Kit's remarkably different handwriting. "Are you writing a tragedy?" she asked, politely.

Kit laughed and Maurice frowned.

"If we are, we're jolly well agreed upon a plan how to bring about the denouement!" he remarked. "Come in or go out, Nerine. There's a trade wind coming through that door."

It was shut as he spoke, and Nerine was making her way softly through the house to the scene of Satterlee's imprisonment.

If she had only had the happy thought of disclosing her last night's discovery, the letter Maurice and Kit were concocting to a private inquiry office in Canada might have been differently worded. But nothing was further from Nerine's mind. She ran swiftly down the passage instead and reached Mayne's red baize-covered door. To her delight it had not been closed tightly the previous night, or something was wrong with the latch. It yielded readily to her cautious hand. She went boldly in and let it close behind her.

The air of the room was chilly and seemed to penetrate her bones through the blue cotton blouse she wore. The blinds were lowered, the shutters closed so that it was nearly as dark as night. Suppose Mr. Mayne had returned and was lurking behind the furniture! If he suddenly rushed out upon her, what on earth should she do? At the thought of the severe, dapper, sarcastic stepfather stooping to play terrifying schoolboy tricks, the girl laughed softly. Why indulge in silly hobgoblin fears that were, after all, impossible?

She felt her way to the window and drew up the blind. Open the shutters she dared not; the window looked directly on the stables, and an opened shutter might bring that devoted henchman, Jones, upon her.

In the half light which reigned when all the blinds were raised Nerine looked curiously about her. It was years since she had been in this room, which had been half sitting-room, half-dressing-room in her mother's day. There was the solid little table Lord Satterlee had overturned last night. Nerine went down on her knees beside it and began to fumble for the secret drawer; quite uselessly. She could not even find out where it ought to be!

"Odious little wretch, I don't mind if I break you!" she said to herself, and with a little rush at the unfortunate bit of furniture she knocked it over exactly as Satterlee had done. Out sprung the drawer, and she bent over it eagerly. With the exception of a daguerreotype case, there was not one thing in it. There was certainly no sign of a key.

Disappointedly Nerine began to look about the floor; the key might have fallen out last night, like the diary. But there was nothing to be seen but two or three little spots of dust. Perhaps the da uerreotype was a likeness of her mother. She would take it if it were. But when she had unfastened the rusty catch there was no picture inside more interesting than that of Maurice—Maurice as a chubby boy. On a little slip of paper pasted inside the cover of the case were some words in Mrs. Lispenard's writing.

"Maurice, two years old, November." There was no date, and Nerine shut the case rather crossly and put it back in the drawer. There was no sense in taking possession of a hideous portrait of Maurice as a baby, with photographer's pink in his cheeks and ridiculous fat legs.

She strolled round the room looking angrily at all the things Mayne had appropriated to his own use. Why, she wondered, had he crowded so much of the furniture in a heap? Was it his intention to sell it?

"While I am in the camp of the enemy I may as well see it thoroughly," she reflected, trying the door leading into the next room. It was unfastened. Mr. Mayne had evidently relied on that latch of his which had placed him so false for protection, or else had left the locking up of his rooms to Jones.

Nerine pushed the door back sharply and heedlessly. Then she stood on the threshold aghast.

The room was empty, as she had expected. But it was also very evident that it had not been so for very long. On the white marble hearth was a neatly-kept fire; on the soft, thick rug before it lay a book, upside down; in the window was a stand full of white hyacinths and ferns, which must have been put there fresh since Mr. Mayne's departure or have been watered and cared for every day.

The warm, luxurious scent of the room made her shiver far more than the chill of the one from which she had just come. There was something odd about it. Could it be brandy that she smelled so distinctly over the perfume of the hyacinths?

With a tremor of fear, so potent was the dread of Clarence Mayne, Nerine softly slipped shut the door and hurried through the next room to the passage, only stopping on the way to pull down those blinds which might tell a tale. Not till she was safely out in the passage did she feel secure.

What could be going on in Clarence Mayne's rooms, which were at such a safe distance from their part of the house? Had he never gone away at all, or was there some one living in his rooms during his absence?"

She sat on the back stairs down which Lord Satterlee had blundered and was astonished to find her knees shaking.

"Bah! My good girl!" she thought, angrily, "you are an idiot. If Mr. Mayne had been in the house all this week, would he not have clamored for his meals as usual? It must be Jones who is responsible for the odor of the brandy!"

And the flowers? Nerine sat completely nonplussed. Ought she to go and tell the others? Maurice would only say that probably Jones had orders always to be ready for his master's return and Mr. Mayne invariably had flowers; the florist's cart was forever coming to Lispenard House.

"I will go back again tonight and see what is going on! And I won't say a word to the others till I have something to show them," she was deciding, when her own name, loudly called, made her jump to her feet.

It was Maurice, lustily bawling that lunch was ready.

Nerine resolutely banished her morning's experience from her mind as she washed the dust off her fingers. Why worry over what was, after all, Mr. Mayne's concern? Only tonight, before she went to bed, she would make pretty certain that whoever might be in her stepfather's apartments could not get out into their part of the house.

* * * * * * * * * * *

"Come for a walk after lunch, you people," said Agatha while they were still busy over the unwonted luxuries left from the evening before.

"Come for a drive," Maurice rejoined. "Walking is only fit for slaves! Besides, we must be at home by five. Satterlee said he would be over."

"I don't fancy he wants us to await his arrival seated in a row in the hall," Agatha's color rose in spite of her elder-sisterly manner. "And it's so chilly to drive."

"Kit's coming," he said, simply. He was not going to lose his Kit even one afternoon.

"Kit has a sealskin coat," was on the tip of Agatha's tongue, but she did not utter it. "Kit is, of course, eager for a drive," she remarked; "now, Nerine and I require exercise."

Kit blushed.

"Oh, let us all go together for a walk," she said, teasingly, and met Maurice's eyes full on her, with remonstrance rampant in them.

Nerine saw his look and laughed.

"Go your own gait, my children," she cried. "Agatha and I don't want you. As for Lord Satterlee, perhaps we shall meet him in our quiet country promenade. Agatha, since it is at least three years since we have had a pudding for lunch, perhaps you will give your sister some more."

Two hours later, as she marched gayly along a muddy road with Agatha, her idle words were unexpectedly realized. A smart dogcart came up behind them at a rattling pace and was pulled up beside them. A groom jumped down and went to the horse's head, and Lord Satterlee, buttoned to the chin in a wonderful driving coat, threw away a half smoked cigar, took off his hat, and got down into the black mud to shake hands with the two girls.

Precisely alike in their serge skirts and coats and their little felt hats, the Lispenard twins stood by the wintry hedge, their black heads and the soft rose tint in their cheeks the only bit of color in the prevailing dreariness.

Satterlee's last night's lesson of "which was which" was quite wasted as he looked at them. For the life of him he could not distinguish between them.

"This is rather a piece of luck for me," he said with that debonair smile and glance which belonged to him. "I was going to see you, but I would only have missed you if I had not taken a turn round here first. Are you taking a constitutional or," his pleasant smile a little dashed, "are you going to see some one?"

"Not the last, certainly," said Nerine, laughing. "We haven't a sign of an object."

"I have," said Satterlee, boldly. "I am going to the florist's to order flowers and palms and things for our dance. We are thinking of giving a small dance next week, Miss Lispenard. I hope you and your sister and Maurice are going to honor us."

He was walking slowly along with the two girls, his servant leading his horse at slow pace behind them, and his eyes happening to rest for a second on the ground, he missed the quick and curious glance which passed between the two sisters. A dance! They had not since their school days been at one, and they were always so fond of dancing. What heaven it would be to go! But also what an impossibility.

"We have not been to a dance for years," Agatha spoke, quickly.

"Then, don't you think it's about time to begin again?" Satterlee said, evidently quite certain his advice would be followed. "Tell me, Miss Lispenard, are you going home now? May I not drive you and your sister?"

"We were going across the fields, thank you," Agatha said, simply. "It is only a little bit of a distance if one goes that way."

"May I go that way, then?" he asked. "I mean may I walk home with you? You know I was going to see you in any case. Though, of course, if you don't want me I can go round by the road."

Nerine looked up at him quickly, half sweetly, half provokingly.

"But you are going to the florist's," she said. "It would be a pity to prevent you."

Satterleee looked at the curled black lashes which fell over the mockery in her eyes.

"As you have prevented me," he returned, coolly, "perhaps you will make up for it by letting me go home with you."

He stopped to give an order to his servant, and then hurried after the two graceful, active young women, already some yards in front of him, discoursing wildly, could Satterlee but have known it, upon how in the world they were to avoid going to his ball without offending him.

"Because we never can go," Agatha said. "Why, we've not even an evening petticoat, much less a gown, between us!"

Nerine was looking straight ahead into the darkening afternoon.

"I should adore going," she said, softly. "Fancy, Agatha, how long it has been since we were at a dance?"

"And we are not going to see this one," ruefully. "Talk of something else," quickly, as Satterlee caught up to them, "or he will harp on it all the way home."

CHAPTER VII.

THE TWINS IN A DILEMMA.

Agatha might as well have tried to stop Niagara. Not only did Lord Satterlee discuss the subject all the way across the wintry fields, but on the threshold of Lispenard House. Long past the time when in an orthodox household the parlor maid would have sternly carried off the tea tray and the dish which had held the nicely browned toast, the Lispenard family, Miss Belton, and Lord Satterlee were still gathered in the fire-lighted morning-room round their humble board. Lord Satterlee was indeed standing with his back to the fire, a stalwart, tall shape against the glowing coals, but it was to discourse with greater effect, not at all to say good by.

"You see, Lispenard," he was saying, "it isn't as though the mess were giving it. There are only four fellows in it, myself and three others, so that your sisters not having called on our major's wife (who's the only lady we have) doesn't come in at all. She has nothing to do with it."

Agatha took the answer out of Maurice's mouth.

"We could not possibly go." In the half dark she raised her steady gray eyes to his blue and eager ones. "Maurice may be chaperon enough for us, but I don't think Miss Belton's mother would think him enough to look after her."

Lord Satterlee turned to Maurice.

"If I can arrange it will you bring your sisters to my dance?" he said, point blank.

But Maurice still looked doubtful, his nineteen-year-old prudence rather up in arms.

"They must decide for themselves," he returned. "You don't want particularly to know tonight, do you?"

Agatha sighed with relief. She had been horribly afraid Maurice might give an unqualified assent to this maddest of mad ideas.

Nerine gave a little sigh also, but one of resignation.

"We are very prudent, aren't we?" she inquired. "You have to be if you hate your guardian as we do," uncovering the family skeleton with perfect indifference.

"You are quite right of course," Satterlee remarked in a tone of disappointment and, in spite of himself, crossly. Had he not proposed giving this dance simply to see Agatha Lispenard at it? He straightened himself up and prepared to take his leave. It was too late to dine at mess; he would have to dine at the club. "But do try and think it over," he said, appealing instinctively to Nerine as the most easily won over to his side.

He was beginning to know the sisters apart now.

"What fun it would be to go!" Kit cried as the door closed on him.

"And what fun it would be confronting your mother and our beloved stepfather afterward! I can hear him congratulating us on having made ourselves the sensation in a garrison town. Besides," Agatha was arguing bravely against her inclination, "we couldn't go if the Queen or Princess of Wales offered to take us—unless she gave us a gown to go in!"

Kit turned scarlet.

Yesterday she could have given both girls an evening dress and never felt the expense. Today all her money was mortgaged in that wild-goose chase Maurice and she had begun in Canada. In rather a gloomy silence the three girls sat and regarded the dying fire. It was a relief when Maurice re-entered after having seen Lord Satterlee out of the gate.

The uncounted hours of the night before and the long trudges of the afternoon had made Agatha sleepy; as soon as the clock struck half-past nine she and Kit went off to bed.

"In a minute," Nerine answered carelessly, when Maurice inquired if she were not going to follow their example, and she did leave the room as soon as she thought the other girls safe by Kit's fire. Instead of following them, she marched boldly down the long corridor to Mayne's rooms; at the red baize door she slipped off her shoes, felt in her pocket for the matches and the candle end with which she had provided herself, and then, with an uncomfortably beating heart and not too steady a hand, opened the door and stood in her mother's room. It was pitch dark and it was perfectly silent.

Very quietly the girl crossed the room, feeling her way through the heaped-up furniture. At the opposite door she paused a long time, listening intently. Everything was quiet; she tried the door; it was locked on the inside, hard and fast.

Someone had been there since this morning.

"I will make very certain there is no one there now," the girl thought, grimly. If the key were in the lock there might be a light on the other side of the door without her seeing it.

The Wizard Charm

by Joseph F. Novak

"Oh! St. Patrick was a gentleman

And on it put a steeple."

KATHLEEN KELLEY sniffed as she carefully ironed out the frills of her last summer's gown. Kathleen was an economist. She had taken out the dress, and a bit of ribbon, a bit of lace, and a yard or two of chiffon had transformed the white creation which had done service during the last summer into a good counterfeit of the latest style exhibited in the fashion sheet given away free at the local department store.

Kathleen's gown was beautiful. In fact so well had she done, she should have been elated. But she wasn't, and as she stood ironing, she now and then wiped away the tears which slowly oozed to her eyes. Kathleen was unhappy.

Suddenly through the open window, raised a bit even though the March morning was chilly in spite of its brightness, came the rattling whistlings of a street organ in the strains of "St. Patrick's Day in the Morning."

Kathleen listened to the children in the court below in indignation, for they were shouting out in derision:

"The bells were ringing,
The devils were singing,
All on St. Patrick's morning,
The bells were ringing,
The devils were singing,
All on St. Patrick's morning,
La la la la la la la,
La la la la la la la la,
La la la la la la la la,
La la! la! la!"

Now, as it was St. Patrick's Day in the morning, and as Kathleen heard the little German, Polish and Lithuanian kids of the neighborhood singing that song in their derisive way, she became properly vexed, and being in an angry mood anyhow, she threw up the window to its fullest extent and leaned out.

"Shure, an', do quit yer noise, and ye, ye Gypsy Dago, git out o' th' Coort, d'ye hear?"

The "Gypsy Dago," obedient, quit playing, and Kathleen feeling quite virtuous in not having suffered the dear Irish song to be murdered by an organ grinder and derisive kids, went back to her work.

But anon, her tears again oozed to her eyes. Why was she unhappy?

Wasn't her gown beautiful? And wasn't she going to the grand ball of the Bright Shamrock Club that night? An invitation to the Bright Shamrock affair was a thing to dream over and delight in, for while the doings of the Bright Shamrock organization did not appear in the annals of the Blue Book's elect, still in that particular neighborhood to receive an invitation was to be considered somebody, and it was something to gloat over in the presence of those not fortunate enough to receive a "bid." Indeed, Kathleen prized it more than she would have prized an invitation to an opera party supervised by the most exclusive dowager of the realm.

In spite of these two happinesses, Kathleen was disappointed. But, with a proud toss of her head, she banged down her irons as she finished her work, and smelt long of the green carnations which she had purchased to wear that night, and which she had bought early lest she be left the last minute.

But even this did not cheer her. Why was she so unhappy?

Ah, the answer! Kathleen loved! But the boy she loved was not going to take her to the Bright Shamrock's affair. She had believed he would, and being "ditched" by him, was the cause of her grief, and so, when she discovered that he was to take another, with a sorrowful heart she determined to accept the first escort who came along.

It happened to be Mike Dooley. Now, Mike was a good fellow, but he was often apt to take a drop too much, and should he do so at the Bright Shamrock's affair, it would mean that Kathleen might have to go home alone in case Mike became too "stewed." But she didn't care much, and so she accepted his escort.

She hadn't believed that Dennis could be so fickle. Dennis had always admired her above all women. But though he might have loved Kathleen, he was quite aware of what havoc his bonny blue eyes could play, and how utterly irresistible his curling red hair was, and so, like all males, harbored a germ of conceit which sometimes tempted him too strongly. And this was the case now.

For recently, an Amazon of dashing proportions had moved into the neighborhood with a glib tongue for compliments, and so thick did she spread her praises of his many manly beauties that Dennis quite lost his head, became her slave and invited her to the Bright Shamrock's Ball.

This girl, who had so completely fascinated him, was a Polish creature with the jaw-breaking baptismal appellation of "Cornelka Walinzgorski." However, when her father first came over and got a job, his name was too much of a struggle for the foreman, who foreshortened the name to "Walin," and so his daughter evolved from "Cornelka Walinzgorski" the rather nice sounding "Cora Walin." This selfsame Cora had graduated from grammar school, and had gone to work in a department store where she learned the use of cosmetics, and with her inherent taste for gaudy colors, generally looked like a rainbow when she appeared on the streets.

No one knew much about the Walin family, and nothing of their humble beginnings, so, in the parlance of the neighborhood, they were, "some class."

And it was for this "Polack crature" that Kathleen was deserted. And to think that Dennis would invite her to the ball of the Bright Shamrocks. Kathleen had been over long enough to realize that this is a cosmopolitan country, and that Poles, Irish, Jews, Germans and all, hive together, and dance together, but somehow St. Patrick's Day and the Bright Shamrock's dance seemed only for those from the ould sod.

With these thoughts in mind, Kathleen was mad and sad and disappointed and ready for almost anything. Something really had to be done for if she did not get Dennis from the clutches of that "Polack crature" he might really marry her. It was alarming the way young people nowaday disregarded nationality and intermarried with foreigners! She must save Dennis from that, and incidentally for herself. Poor child! She loved Dennis so well that she couldn't help it.

As she wondered what plan she could pursue, there came a knock on the door. Kathleen went and opened it. There stood the "Gypsy Dago." He was around collecting pennies for the music he had rendered, and was giving promises of more for any additional nickels and pennies that might be given. Pompilio had left Guiseppina to watch the organ while he collected.

"You gimme da mon, for da muzic?" Pompilio queried, with outstretched hand.

"Ye git out o' here, ye Gypsy Dago, I ain't got no pennies fer th' likes o' ye."

"Me playa da fina muzic, Signorina," persisted Pompilio.

"I ain't done no sinnin' yit, so don't call me a sinnerino, er I'll land ye a clout. Git out o' here, anyhow," and Kathleen burst into tears.

"Da laidee, she kry," commented Pompilio, "she gotta da sad heart. For vhy you kry, Signorina?"

"Say, ain't I warned ye not to call me no sinnerino?" blazed Kathleen.

"Signorina ain't no 'sinnerino,' laidee, that means 'Mees,' 'young laidee,' 'purty goil,' in Italian Dago," explained Pompilio, blowing a kiss from his fingers which he had brought to his lips with a most wonderful flourish.

"Shure, an' 'tis that it m'ans, is it?" she queried, somewhat mollified. "All right."

"Whata for you kry?" continued Pompilio. "you fighta with da lover, yees?"

It was only too true, and apparently Pompilio guessed it, for he continued:

"I gotta da something I sella signorina what bringa da lover back, yees!"

Kathleen opened her eyes in astonishment.

"Phwat's that yez be sayin'?"

"I gotta da something I sella signorina what bringa da lover back," he repeated.

"Phwat's it?"

"It ees da wizard charm," said Pompilio.

"Phwat's a wizard charm, ye hathen?"

"Signorina wanta da see it, yees?" and from an inner pocket he took a small stick about two inches long. It was a bit of bough of a tree, with a silver tip and a bit of tinsel wound about it.

"Where d'ye git it?" she asked suspiciously.

"Get eet?" he queried in turn. "I get eet in da great old countree, Ireland. Eet ees made from da tree what grows by da town where da grea' St. Patrick was born, an' he planta da tree heemself! Yees!"

Kathleen was not one of the scoffers who believe that St. Patrick may have been an imaginary creature made real from the legends of his time. She firmly believed that St. Patrick lived and died, and chased the snakes out of Ireland. She didn't know that there was any doubt as to the place of his birth, nor that he is popularly believed to have been born in Scotland and captured by pirates, and as it never occurred to her to doubt the fact but that he must have been born in Ireland, it seemed very plausible that he might have planted a tree which was growing yet. However, she would not jump at it.

"I don't belave ye, Guinnie," she said. "I don't believe it kin do phwat ye sez it kin."

"How you know when you no trya it?" Pompilio demanded.

This was a staggerer for Kathleen, but she rallied.

"Well, sposin' I wud buy it, how much d'ye want fer it?"

"Three dollar sixty-nine cent," was his price.

"Oh, wurra, git! 'Taint worth that," she objected.

"No? Oh, verrya da well, I kgo! But I no comma back, an' signorina she feela da sorry when her lover no comma back—go off with 'nother signorina!" And he prepared to leave.

Kathleen grabbed him.

"Pwait, Dago," she said, "I'll buy yer charm, but how do I know it'll work?"

Pompilio was politic.

"I showa you how it work. I poka you wid it, an' see if you no feela lika givin' me da clout in da ear," he said, pressing it against the flesh of her plump arm.

Marvelous! Never had she felt so strongly inclined to box a "Dago's" ears. If it had that effect, of course it ought to have others.

"Pwhy, shure, an', I feel like givin' ye a clout," she exclaimed, delighted.

"Ah!" Pompilio breathed, "I tella signorina so, yees? now, signorina poka me, an' wish I kees you, an' see if I no feela lika keesing signorina."

Kathleen tried.

Immediately Pompilio's eyes rolled, and his arms reached out to clasp her to him.

"Shure, that's enough," said Kathleen, "I changed me mind about havin' ye kiss me."

"I no feela lika keesin' da signorina now," Pompilio said sorrowfully, "an' now I remember my Guiseppina who turna da organ-handle. You broka da charm. Now, when you poka da lover, an' wanta heem to lova you, he will, he gotta, da charm maka heem obey da vill of da one who holds it."

Kathleen was now quite convinced.

"Shure, an', I'll buy yer charm, but three dollars an' sixty-nine cents is purty stheep. Make it a little cheaper!"

They haggled for sometime, with the result that Kathleen got the charm for two dollars and seventy-six cents, the "Gypsy Dago" refusing to come down another cent. But after all, what was two dollars and seventy-six cents compared to regaining Dennis's love?

Pompilio made a quick getaway and the sound of his music rose here and there spasmodically, until it was lost in the distance.

But the world had brightened for Kathleen. She had a charm that was manufactured from a bough that grew upon a tree planted by St. Patrick. Surely the virtue of his hands and soul had entered into the great tree which must be so very old, and this was probably what made people obey the charm in spite of themselves.

Occasionally a little misgiving did enter her mind, but she did not allow it to harbor there. Hadn't she two beautiful examples of the charm's worth?

So through the rest of the day, she sang over her work, and when seven o'clock came, she hurried to her room and dressed. She looked very pretty in her clean white gown with its new trimming, and the soft green chiffon drapery and her green carnations added a touch of elegance. Her beautiful auburn hair was just the touch of color needed to set off the green and white, and she caused Mike Dooley to go quite into rhapsodies over her.

She was flushed, eager, nervous and very excited. She had heard tales of Cora Walin's gown, and she felt in her secret heart that Cora would quite outshine her as far as dress was concerned, but after all, didn't she have the wizard charm? The wizard charm had made her feel inclined to box Pompilio's ears, and had she willed it, Pompilio would have kissed her. Wasn't that enough evidence of its power?

All these things were in her mind on her way to the hall where the Bright Shamrocks were holdings their ball, and as the place was reached, Kathleen felt a little thrill of genuine pleasure, the first she had known since Cora Walin had loomed up on her horizon.

The crowd was big, and pleasantly noisy, wonderfully dressed and joyous. Everything was really swell. There were palms and decorations. Everyone wore green carnations. The music was very fine. They played the "Wearin' o' the Green," in ragtime, likewise "St. Patrick's Day in the Morning," to say nothing of sundry Irish jigs and reels.

As soon as Mike and Kathleen entered the hall, the girl looked about for Dennis and Cora. But they had not arrived. They did, however, shortly, and Kathleen's heart sank in spite of the fact that she had the wizard's charm. For Cora's rig-out was an exclamation! She wore a white gown with a slit skirt, which (oh, horror!) showed her green silk slipper, and an ankle and four inches of limb incased in a green silk stocking! Over the white silk gown which was a sort of underskirt, she had a drape of green chiffon which trailed off into a train a yard long. The chiffon was covered with a spangly design of silver which glinted and sparkled at her every movement. The waist was one mass of glittering lace cloth and priceless (?) jewels! Her hair was frizzed out in a great pompadour, with a gleaming little harp plastered up against it, while three immense plumes of green attached to a paste-diamond bandeau waved above it all!

In addition to all this glory, she carried a bushel of green carnations which Dennis had sent her. The nerve of her, and she a "Polack crature!"

Poor Kathleen saw that she and Cora had copied their gowns from the same fashion sheet. But what a poor imitation was Kathleen's in comparison!

However, she was not "at outs" with Cora, so laterly she and Mike joined Dennis who beamed with pride at the stunning picture Cora presented and what a hit she had made. In fact, so pleased was he that he even gave the long-suffering Kathleen a dance, during which, her heart, as the proverbial saying is, was "in her boots." What chance had she against that bewildering, gorgeous Cora?

For some time she hardly dared to use the wizard charm. She held it tightly in her hand. But after she and Dennis had danced a bit, she summoned up courage, and poked him in the ribs with it.

He looked at her suddenly, a little puzzled perhaps, and certainly somewhat displeased. This was not the effect it should have, so Kathleen pressed it no further, and they finished their dance in silence. Then they stood on the dance floor awaiting the customary encore. The music presently commenced again and Kathleen tried her charm for the second time.

"Say, Kathleen," Dennis complained, "don't ye grab th' skin o' my ribs that way. It don't feel nice."

Kathleen quailed, the dance ended and they stopped. She looked into Dennis's eyes with a look that he could not fathom, unless, perhaps, it touched his conscience, reminding him of the time when he believed Kathleen was all the world to him. And so, he smiled, thanked her for the dance, and went to the resplendent Cora.

Kathleen was at sea. She didn't know what to do now. Dennis had objected to her "grabbing the skin of his ribs." Still, he had given her a kind smile. Well, perhaps it was a desperate case, and the powers of the wizard charm were being strained, and especially because Cora was present. Perhaps if she tried it when they were alone——

She sat out dances for the most part, along with a few other wall-flowers. Mike had allowed his love of the glass to get the better of him, and he had a stationary place in the barroom, and was deep in inebriate bliss. He would not escort Kathleen home that night.

Poor Kathleen! She sat by herself, gossiping with the other wall-flowers who did nothing but cast remarks, slurs and insults at the more fortunate who were constantly on the floor. Verily a dance is a stupid thing if you haven't an escort. Have you ever gone to a dance without an escort, girls? Don't you do it—it's the most stupid thing you can do!

Wishing herself miles away, Kathleen sat on, hoping against hope that someone would claim her.

Suddenly there was a newcomer! He was a tall young man of graceful build, and dressed in a full dress suit. This was unusual; most of the fellows wore plain black suits and white vests, and a few, notably the committtee, appeared in rented tuxedoes. It was whispered about that this newcomer came in an automobile; he must be "somebody." His face was powdered, his lips rouged and his brows and lashes made up. Truly he looked as if he had escaped from behind the footlights!

The first dance he had with a wall-flower, but as he danced, his eyes roamed over the gathered crowd and finally he spied Cora. It was all off with him too, apparently.

Everyone wondered who he was, and as it was whispered about that he must be a millionaire, he let it go at that. If the truth be told, he was the proprietor of "Haviland's Academy of Society Dancing!"

He secured Cora for a dance, and then—oh, then there was an exhibition! With her Slavic instinct for the dance, Cora at once comprehended his instructions relative to new steps, and soon they were executing some of the most fascinating evolutions of the Tango Argentino and Maxixe Brazilienne!

For several dances, Cora "ditched" her partners to dance with the newcomer, and this made everyone decidedly angry, until it looked as if the dress-suited chap was in for trouble, particularly as he danced with all the best-dressed girls in the hall, complimenting their dancing and securing their addresses, laterly to send them his business card and invitation to visit his Academy, but just now filling their heads full of romantic impossibilities and driving them out of their everyday senses.

The final stroke of his audacity came when he asked Cora out for some refreshment. Then overhearing a plot to "do him up," he proposed to Cora that he take her home in his automobile. A ride in an automobile was a thing not to be turned down, so giddy Cora secured her wraps, for the hour was late anyhow, and they slipped away.

When Dennis went to search for her, later, she was gone.

He had it "put over him." His only consolation was that it took another Irishman to do it! He wandered about disconsolately, then went into a little ante-room adjacent to the wardrobe window where the wraps were handed out to their owners.

Kathleen too, had gone there; she couldn't stand the glamour of the ballroom, and it was her intention to slip away quietly and go home where she could cry to her heart's content.

Dennis now beheld the miserable girl, and nodded, then sat down beside her on the little bench. Truly he was in melancholy mood. To think that Cora would treat him in that manner, and worse that he had brought her to the ball and allowed her to queen it over his Irish sisters! He deserved to be hung for being such a fool! He sat down at Kathleen's side, his back to her.

Poor Kathleen had but one hope left. Dared she try the power of the wizard charm? The moment was auspicious. She shuffled over to his side, and jabbed the silver point into the back turned to her.

Dennis turned on her angrily.

"Fer th' love o' Mike!" he stormed. "What are ye pokin' me in th' ribs fer, anyhow? 'Tis th' third time ye've done it t'night!"

"Oh, it's sthung that I am, 'tis sthung that I am," she wailed.

"Sthung?" he inquired, rubbing his back where she had jabbed him. "What is it ye m'an, Kathleen Kelley?"

"'Tis a wizard charm that I bought from a Gypsy Dago, Dennis. He told me thot if I'd poke ye with it, ye'd fergit that Polack crature an' come back to me. He said th' power o' ould St. Patrick was in this charm which was cut from a tree planted by th' houly ould saint himself. Oh, wurra, I was sthung! Ye hate me th' more instid o' lovin' me," and she went off into a fresh outburst. "An' it cost me two dollars and seventy-six cents," she wailed, showing it to him.

Dennis turned to Kathleen, and as he looked upon her, something rose in his throat. How pretty she looked in her gown of white and green. How sweet, and pretty and helpless! He knew Mike was drunk and that poor Kathleen would have to go home alone. And it was a dark journey home, too. He really must take her, for he had loved her once, had loved her truly before he had seen the gorgeous Cora! Cora! The thought of her perfidy made him rage within. After he had spent three dollars for her carnations, to say nothing of all other incidental expenses, this was how she treated him. And through all his neglect, Kathleen had remained faithful still. And she had tried to win him back, forgiving his trespasses with a wonderfully generous heart.

His own softened. He looked about. There was no one near. The chap in charge of the wardrobe was dozing, so he couldn't see.

Dennis slipped his strong young arms about the drooping form.

"Kathleen, my Colleen, d'ye really love me

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Edith Allandale, the only support of an invalid mother pawns a valuable watch. To redeem it she offers a five-dollar gold piece, paid to her by Royal Bryant, to the broker, who, dropping it into the drawer declares it a counterfeit and returns it. Going home her mother suggests it may be genuine and again Edith goes out to buy food and coal. While eating supper an officer enters, followed by the grocer who insists upon Edith's arrest for passing counterfeit money. She is hurried to the station house, leaving her mother in the care of Kate O'Brien. Edith writes to Royal Bryant explaining the situation. He redeems the watch, secures Edith's release and sends her home, where she finds her mother dying. After her death in reading letters, Edith learns she is an adopted daughter, the child of a dear friend, who believes she is legally a wife, until the father of her child admits his perfidy and deserts her. Edith writes Mr. Bryant, giving no address and goes to Boston, securing a position as companion with Mrs. Gerald Goddard. Edith discovers there is a skeleton in the family, when Mrs. Goddard accuses her of attempting to steal her husband's affections. Emil Correlli, Mrs. Goddard's brother is persistent in his attentions to Edith; she tries to avoid him and decides to leave. Mrs. Goddard begs her to stay. Edith, going to walk renders assistance to Mrs. Stewart, who is attracted to her and shows agitation when she learns she is a companion to Mrs. Goddard, and if she needs a friend to come to her. Edith is overtaken by Emil Correlli. Nearing Mrs. Goddard's house, a woman, unknown to Edith addresses Emil in a foreign tongue. Realizing that Edith thinks there is something mysterious in his relation to this woman he endeavors to set it right, renews his protestations of love, offers marriage and is staggered by her refusal. Mrs. Goddard unfolds a scheme which cannot fail to make Edith Allen his wife, but Emil must go away. Mrs. Goddard plans with Edith for a "mid-winter frolic," at their country home. The housekeeper, Mrs. Weld, overhears Mr. Goddard entreating his wife for a certain document. Mrs. Goddard proposes a theatrical performance entitled "The Masked Bridal." The guests arrive. Mrs. Weld takes a folded paper from Mrs. Goddard's jewel case; it vindicates her. Mrs. Goddard, having sent for Edith and seeing Mrs. Weld in an adjoining room devises a scheme to get her from meeting Edith to whom she explains that Miss Kerby and brother who have the leading parts, have been summoned home and requests Edith to supply Miss Kerby's place. Edith objects to what appears sacrilege. Over persuaded she consents and veiled and masked the ceremony is performed. When she hears Mrs. Goddard congratulate Emil she grasps the duplicity and nearly falls senseless. Mrs. Goddard, returning to the ballroom asks Emil to introduce his friend, Mrs. Stewart.

CHAPTER XV.

"OH, GOD! I KNEW IT! YOU ARE—ISABEL!"

WITH a somewhat reluctant air, Emil Correlli offered his arm to his sister and led her toward the woman around whom a group of distinguished people had gathered and whom she was entertaining with an ease and grace that proclaimed her perfectly at home among the creme de la creme of society.

She appeared not to perceive the approach of her hostess and her brother, but continued the animated conversation in which she was engaged.

A special observer, however, would have noticed the peculiar fire which began to burn in her beautiful eyes.

When Mr. Correlli presented his sister, she turned with fascinating grace, making a charming acknowledgment although she did not offer her hostess her hand.

"You are very welcome, Mrs. Stewart," Mrs. Goddard remarked, in response to some words of apology for being a guest in the house without a previous acquintance. "I only regret that we have not met before."

"Thanks; I, too, deplore the complication of circumstances which has prevented an earlier meeting," was her sweet-voiced response.

But there was a peculiar shading in the remark which somehow, grated harshly upon Anna Goddard's ears.

"Who is she, anyhow?" she questioned within herself with a strange feeling of unrest and perplexity. "I never even heard of her until after Emil came; yet there is something about her that makes me feel as if we had met in some other sphere."

She stole a searching glance at the woman's face, only to find her great, luminous eyes fastened upon her with an equally intent gaze.

"Ah!" and with this voiceless ejaculation and a great inward start, some long dormant memory seemed suddenly to have been aroused within her.

There was an instant of awkwardness; then madam, who seldom allowed anything to disturb her self-possession, remarked:

"I am sorry, Mrs. Stewart, that you did not arrive earlier to witness our little play."

But while she was giving utterance to this polite regret, she was saying to herself:

"Yes, there certainly is a look about her that reminds me of——Ugh! She may possibly be a relative, or the resemblance may be merely a coincidence. All the same, I shall not like her any the better for recalling that horror to me."

"Thank you," Mrs. Stewart replied; "no doubt I should have enjoyed it, especially as, I am told, it was original with you and terminated in a real and very pretty wedding?"

"Yes: my brother finds that he must leave the city earlier than he anticipated; and, as he was anxious to take his bride with him, he chose this opportunity to celebrate his marriage, and to introduce his wife to our friends."

"Ah! I did not even know that Monsieur Correlli was contemplating matrimony. Who is the favored lady of his choice?" Mrs. Stewart inquired.

"A Miss Edith Allen."

"Edith Allen!" repeated the beautiful stranger, with a start.

"Yes," said Mrs. Goddard, regarding her with surprise, but unmixed with anxiety. "Did you ever meet her?"

"Is she very fair and lovely, with golden hair and deep-blue eyes, a tall, slender figure, and charming manners?" eagerly questioned Mrs. Stewart.

"Yes, you have described her exactly," answered madam, yet secretly more disturbed than before; "but I am surprised that you should know her, for she has been in the city only a short time, and I did not suppose she had made a single acquaintance outside the family."

"Oh, I cannot lay claim to an acquaintance with her, as I have only seen her once, and our meeting was purely accidental," the lady responded. "She rendered me efficient service one day when she was out for a walk, and I inquired her name."

She then proceeded to explain the nature of that service and the accident that had called it forth, and concluded by remarking:

"Allow me to say I think that Monsieur Correlli has shown excellent taste in his choice of a wife. I was charmed with the young lady, and I would like to meet her again. Will you introduce me?"

"I am very sorry that I cannot comply with your request," said Mrs. Goddard, flushing slightly; "but Edith is rather delicate and the reception, after the marriage, was such a strain upon her that she fainted and was obliged to retire."

"That was very unfortunate," Mrs. Stewart observed, while she searched her companion's face curiously, "but I trust that I may have the pleasure of meeting her later."

"I cannot promise as to that," madam replied, "as it is my brother's intention to go abroad as soon as he can complete his arrangements to do so, although no date has been set as yet. But—have you ever met my husband, Mrs. Stewart?" she inquired, as that gentleman was seen approaching their way at that moment.

"No, I have never had that honor," the lady returned; then added, with a light laugh; "I feel very much like an intruder to be here tonight as a stranger to both my host and hostess."

"Pray do not be troubled on that account," madam hastened cordially to reply; "any friend of my brother would be a welcome guest, and I am charmed to have made your acquaintance."

"Thank you," responded the beautiful stranger; but madam marveled at the line of white encircling the scarlet lips as she signaled to her husband and called him by name:

"Gerald!"

He glanced up, and both women noticed the expression of weariness and trouble upon his brow.

"You have not been introduced to Emil's friend, I think," his wife continued. "Allow me to present Mrs. Stewart—Mrs. Stewart, my husband, Mr. Goddard."

The gentleman bowed with all his accustomed courtesy, but did not fairly get a glimpse of the lady's face until they both assumed an upright position again, when he found himself looking straight into the magnificent eyes of his guest.

As he met them it seemed as if someone had stabbed him to the heart, so sudden and terrible was the shock that he experienced.

He changed an involuntary groan into a cough, but he could not have been more ghastly if he had been dead, while he continued to gaze upon her as if fascinated.

"Ha! he has noticed it also!" said madam to herself.

Then realizing that something must be done to relieve the awkwardness of the situation, she hastened to observe:

"Mrs. Stewart has only just arrived—she did not come in season to witness our little drama."

Mr. Goddard murmured some polite words of regret, but feeling all the while as if he were turning to stone.

Mrs. Stewart, however, responded in a pleasant vein, and chatted socially for a few moments, when, some other friends joining them, more introductions followed, and the conversation became general.

Gerald Goddard improved this opportunity to slip away; but his wife, who was covertly watching his every look and movement, noticed that he walked with the uncertain step of one who was either blind or intoxicated.

A feeling of depression settled upon her—a sense of impending evil, which, try as she would, she could neither forget nor shake off.

An hour later Mrs. Stewart again sought her hostess and wished her good night, remarking that circumstances which she could not control compelled her to take an early leave.

"Ah! that is unfortunate, for supper will shortly be announced; cannot you possibly remain to partake of it?" madam urged, with cordial hospitality.

"Thanks, no; but I am promising myself the pleasure of meeting you again in the near future," Mrs. Stewart returned, shooting a searching glance at her hostess.

Her language and manner were perfect; but, for the second time that evening, Anna Goddard noticed the peculiar shading in her words, and a chill that was like a breath from an iceberg went shivering over her.

She, however, replied courteously, and then Mrs. Stewart swept from the room upon the arm of her attendant.

Many earnest and curious glances followed the stately couple, for the lady was reported to be immensely rich, while it had also been whispered that the gentleman attending her—a distinguished artist—had long been a suitor for her hand; but, for some reason best known to herself, the lady had thus far turned a deaf ear to his entreaties, although it was evident that she regarded him with the greatest esteem, if not with sentiments of a tender nature.

After passing through the covered walk leading to the house, the two separated—the gentleman to attend to having their carriage called, the lady to go up-stairs for her wraps.

As she was about to enter the dressing-room to get them, a picture hanging between two windows at the end of the hall attracted her eye.

"Ah!" she exclaimed, catching her breath sharply, and moving swiftly toward it, she seemed to forget everything, and stood, with clasped hands and heaving bosom, spellbound before it.

It represented a portion of an old Roman wall—a marvelously picturesque bit of scenery, with climbing vines that seemed to cling to the gray stones lovingly, as if to conceal their irregular lines and other ravages which time and the elements had made upon them; while here and there, growing out from its crevices, were clusters of delicate maiden-hair fern, the bright green of which contrasted beautifully with the weather-beaten wall and the darker, richer coloring of the vines.

Just underneath, partly in the shadow of the wall, there sat, upon a rustic bench, a beautiful Italian girl, dressed in the costume of her country, while at her feet reclined her lover, his hat lying on the grass beside him, his handsome face upturned to the maiden, whom it was evident he adored.

It was a charming picture, very artistic, and finely executed, while the subject was one that appealed strongly to the tenderest sentiments of the human heart.

But the face of the woman who was gazing upon it was deathly white. She was motionless as a statue, and seemed to have forgotten time, place, and her surroundings, as she drank in with her wonderful eyes the scene before her.

"It is the wall upon the Appian Way in Rome," she breathed at last, with a long-drawn sigh.

"You are right, madam," responded a voice close at hand, the sound of which caused the woman to press her clasped hands hard upon her heaving bosom, though she gave no other sign of being startled.

The next moment she turned and faced the speaker.

It was Gerald Goddard.

"I heard no one approaching—I thought I was alone," she said, as she lifted those wonderful eyes of hers to his.

He shrank from her glance as under a lightning flash that had burst upon him unawares.

But quickly recovering himself, he courteously remarked:

"Pardon me—I trust I have not startled you."

"Only momentarily," she replied; then added: "I was admiring this painting; it is very lovely and—most faithfully portrays the scene from which it was copied."

"Ah! you recognize the—the locality?"

"Perfectly."

"You—you have been in—Rome?" the man faltered.

"Oh, yes."

"Recently?"

There was a sort of breathless intensity about the man as he asked this question.

"No; I was in Rome—in the year 18—."

At this response, Gerald Goddard involuntarily put out his hand and laid it upon the balustrade, near which he was standing, while he gazed spellbound into the proud, beautiful face before him searching it with wild, eager eyes.

After a moment he partially recovered himself, and remarked:

"Is it possible? I myself was in Rome during the same year and painted this picture at that time. Were—were you in the city long?" he concluded.

"From January until—until June."

For the second time that evening Mr. Goddard suppressed a groan with a cough.

"Ah! It is a singular coincidence is it not, that I also was there during those months?"

"A coincidence?" his companion repeated, with a slight lifting of her shapely brows, a curious gleam in her eyes. Then throwing back her head with an air of defiance which was intensified by the glitter of those magnificent stones which crowned her lustrous hair, and with a peculiar cadence ringing through her tones, she observed: "Rome is a lovely city—do you not think so? And, as it happened, I resided in a delightful portion of it. Possibly you may remember the locality. It was a charming little house, with beautiful trees—oleander, orange and fig—growing all around the spacious court. This pretty ideal home was Number 34, Via Nationale."

The wretched man stared helplessly at her for one brief moment when she had concluded, then a cry of despair burst from him.

"Oh, God! I knew it! You—you are Isabel?"

"Yes."

"Then you were not—you did not——"

"Die? No," was the brief response.

A mighty shudder shook Gerald Goddard from head to foot as he reeled backward and leaned against the wall for support.

"Oh, God!" he cried again in a voice of agony; then his head dropped heavily upon his breast.

His companion gazed silently upon him for a minute; then, turning, she brushed by him without a word and went on into the dressing-room for her wraps.

Presently she came forth again, enveloped from head to foot in a long garment richly lined with fur, the scarlet lining of the hood contrasting beautifully with her clear, flawless complexion and her brown eyes.

Gerald Goddard still stood where she had left him.

She would have passed him without a word, but he put out a trembling hand to detain her.

"Isabel!" he faltered.

"Mrs. Stewart, if you please," she corrected.

"Ha! you have married again!" he exclaimed.

"Married again?" she repeated, with curling lips. "I have not so perjured myself."

"But—but——"

"Yes, I know what you would say," she interposed, "nevertheless, I claim the matron's title, and 'Stewart' was my mother's maiden name," and she was about to pass on again

"Stay," said the man, nervously. "I—I must see you again—I must talk further with you."

"Very well," the lady coldly returned, "and I also have some things which I wish to say to you. I shall be at the Copley Square Hotel on Thursday afternoon. I will see you as early as you choose to call."

Then, with an air of grave dignity, she passed on, and down the stairs, without casting one backward glance at him.

"Heavens! and I deserted that glorious woman for—a virago!" Gerald Goddard muttered, hoarsely, as he strode, white and wretched, to his room.

CHAPTER XVI.

"YOU SHALL NEVER WANT FOR A FRIEND."

Up in the third story, poor Edith lay upon her bed, still in an unconscious state.

All the wedding finery had been removed and carried away, and she lay scarcely less white than the spotless robe de nuit she wore, her lips blue and pinched, her eyes sunken and closed.

A physician sat beside her, his fingers upon her pulse, his eyes gravely fixed upon the beautiful, waxen face lying on the pillow.

Two housemaids, looking frightened and anxious, were seated near him, watching him and the still figure on the bed, but ready to obey whatever command he might issue to them.

After introducing his sister to Mrs. Stewart, Emil Correlli had slipped away from the scene of gayety, which had become almost maddening to him, and mounted to that third-story room to inquire again regarding the condition of the girl he had so wronged.

"No better," came the answer, which made him turn with dread, and slinking away to his own room, he drank deeply to stupefy himself, and then went to bed.

Gerald Goddard also was strangely exercised over the fair girl's condition, and half an hour after his interview with Mrs. Stewart he crept forth from his room again and went to see if there had been any change in her condition.

"Yes," Dr. Arthur told him, "she is coming out of it, and if another does not follow, she will come around all right in time. If you could only find that housekeeper," he added, "she must have good care through the night."

"I will go for her again," said Mr. Goddard, and he started down-stairs upon his quest.

He met the woman on the second floor and just coming up the back stairs.

"Ah! Mrs. Weld, I am glad to find you. We have needed you sadly," he eagerly exclaimed.

"I am sorry," the woman replied, in a regretful tone. "I was unavoidably engaged and came just as soon as I was at liberty. What is this I hear?" she continued, gravely; "what is this story about the poor child being cheated into a real marriage with madam's brother? Is it true?"

"Hush! no one must hear such a version."

Mr. Goddard then proceeded to explain something of the matter, for he saw that she knew too much to keep still, unless she was told more, and cautioned not to discuss the matter with the servants.

"I knew nothing of the plot until it was all over—I swear to you I did not," he said, when she began to express her indignation at the affair. "I never would have permitted anything of the kind to have been carried out in my house, if I had suspected it. It seems that Correlli has been growing fond of her ever since he came. She has refused him twice, but he swore that he would have her, in spite of everything, and it seems that he concocted this plot to accomplish his end."

"Well, sir, he is a dastardly villain, and, in my opinion, his sister is no better than himself," Mrs. Weld exclaimed, in tones of hot indignation, and then she swept past him and on up to Edith's room.

She opened the door and entered just as the poor girl heaved a long sigh and unclosed her eyes, looking about with complete consciousness for the first time since she fell to the floor in the parlor below.

The physician immediately aministered a stimulant, for she was naturally weak and her pulses still feeble.

As this began to take effect, memory also resumed its torturing work.

Lifting her eyes to the housekeeper, who went

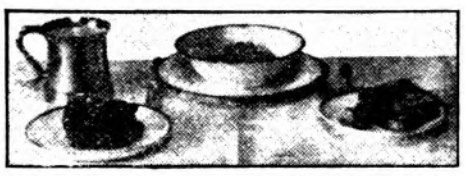
Uncle Sam tells how to feed Children

By Stanley Wells



Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

TO some it may seem rather strange that this great government of ours should devote time and money to investigation and experiment along the lines of nourishment for children between three and six years of age.

As a matter of fact nothing else is of half the importance to our government as the rearing of strong, healthy children. The wise officials in charge of our government departments know full well that the children of today will be the very sinews of the government tomorrow, and that the stronger and healthier they are, the better men and women they will be and the better government they will maintain.

Whatever may be the national policy on military preparedness, Uncle Sam certainly believes in the bodily preparedness of every little citizen, and he has constantly at work a large staff of trained men and women who are doing everything possible to help fathers and mothers to rear better children. Much of this valuable work is done under the direction of C. F. Langworthy, Chief of the Office of Home Economics, and the very latest work consists of careful instructions in the matter of food for the young.

At the close of every day, says Caroline L. Hunt, Scientific Assistant to Professor Lang-

A Sensible Breakfast—Baked Apple, Cereal Mush, Milk and Toast with Butter worthy, every mother of a child between the ages of three and six should ask herself these questions:

Did each child take about a quart of milk in one form or another?

Have I taken pains to see that the milk that comes to my house has been handled in a clean way?

If I was obliged to serve skim-milk for the sake of cleanness or economy, did I supply a little extra fat in some other way?

Were the fats which I gave the child of the wholesome kind found in milk, cream, butter, and salad oils, or of the unwholesome kind found in doughnuts and other fried foods?

Did I make good use of all skim-milk by using it in the preparation of cereal mushes, puddings, or otherwise?

Were all cereal foods thoroughly cooked?

Was the bread soggy? If so, was it because the loaves were too large, or because they were not cooked long enough?

Did I take pains to get a variety of foods from the cereal group by serving a cereal mush once during the day?

Did I keep in mind that while cereals are good foods in themselves, they do not take the place of meat, milk, eggs, fruit and vegetables?

Did I keep in mind that children who do not have plenty of fruit and vegetables need whole-wheat bread and whole grains served in other ways?

Did each child have an egg or an equivalent amount of meat, fish, or poultry?

Did any child have more than this of flesh foods or eggs? If so, might the money not have been better spent for fruits or vegetables?

If I was unable to get milk, meat, fish, poultry, or eggs, did I serve dried beans, or other legumes thoroughly cooked and carefully seasoned?

Were vegetables and fruits both on the child's bill of fare once during the day? If not, was it because we have not taken pains to raise them in our home garden?

Did either the fruit or the vegetable disagree with the child? If so, ought I to have cooked it more thoroughly, chopped it more finely, or have removed the skins or seeds?

Was the child given sweets between meals, or anything that tempted him to eat when he was not hungry?

Was he allowed to eat sweets when he should have been drinking milk or eating cereals, meat, eggs, fruit, or vegetables?

Were the sweets given to the child simple, i. e., unmixed with much fat or with hard substances difficult to chew, and not highly flavored?

Ideal Dinner for Child—Lamb Chop, Baked Potato, Spinach, Bread and Butter, Boiled Rice with Sugar and Milk.

Was the child made to eat slowly and chew his food properly?

A young child may be considered well fed if he has plenty of milk, bread, and other cereal food; an egg once a day or its equivalent in flesh foods; a small portion each of carefully prepared fruits and vegetables, with a small amount of sweet food after his appetite for other foods is satisfied. If there is too much or too little of any of these, his diet is one sided.

Now Uncle Sam, so ably represented by his experts, understands thoroughly that he must go into details with the mothers, that he must explain just what to give the youngsters, not as a whole, but what varieties may be used for breakfast, for dinner and for supper.

For breakfast he sets forth six menus, which are valuable suggestions, and these serve to show how to balance the food, so that while these need not be followed out exactly to the letter, the mother can understand by them how to supply for each breakfast a combination that is, under normal conditions, certain to give the baby health, strength and contentment. These suggested menus are:

Orange. (Juice only for youngest children.)
Farina with milk. Bread and butter.

Apple sauce (no seeds or skins).
Oatmeal with milk. Toast and butter.

Baked pears. (Pulp only for youngest).
Milk toast. Cocoa.

Stewed prunes. (Pulp only for youngest).
Corn-meal mush and milk. Toast and butter.

Grape fruit. (Juice only for youngest).
Milk toast with grated yolk of hard boiled egg.

Apple. (Scraped for little children).
Toast. Hot milk.

For the dinners a more elaborate menu may be used. Uncle Sam advises the following:

Meat soup. Egg on toast.
String beans. Rice pudding.

Roast beef. Baked potato.
Asparagus. Bread and jelly.

Lamb stew wih carrots and potato.
Twice-baked bread. Taploc custard.

Creamed potatoes. Green peas.
Stewed plums, thin cereal milk pudding.

Baked halibut. Boiled potatoes. Stewed celery.
Boiled rice with honey or sirup.

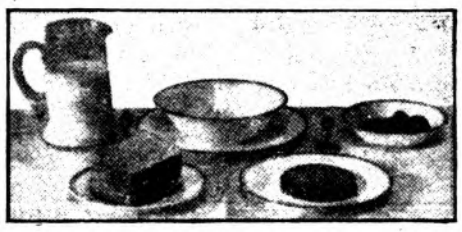
Broiled meat cakes. Grits. Creamed carrots.
Bread, butter and sugar sandwiches.

For the little folks' supper these variations of the menu are suggested:

Baked potatoes, with cream and salt or milk gravy. Cookies.

Bread and milk. Sponge cake. Apple sauce.

Potato milk soup. Twice-baked bread.
Marmalade sandwiches.



Graham crackers and milk. Baked custard.

Milk toast. Stewed peaches. Cup cake.

Celery-milk soup. Toast. Floating island.

In each case enough milk should be given to make up the required daily amount, which is about a quart. If the meals do not contain this average of milk, see that the child gets it plain, as a drink, as it is needed to balance the diet, since it is so rich in lime. The vegetables supply the needed iron, but the balance of lime is equally as necessary, hence the need of the quart a day of milk, either in the food or as a drink.

"Milk," Uncle Sam, through his experts, goes on to say, "is the natural food of babies and the most important food for young children. A quart of milk a day is a good allowance for a child. Milk may be served on fruits that are not very acid (baked apples or pears, berries, and others), in soups, gravies, custard, junket, and other puddings, and may be used in place of water in cooking cereals.

"Good whole milk is desirable, but if a mother is obliged to choose between clean milk and rich milk, she had better take the clean milk. Best of all, of course, is clean, whole milk, but if that cannot be obtained it is better to use clean fresh skim-milk than dirty or questionable whole milk. A quart of skim-milk, even separator skim-milk, contains about a third of a cupful of solid food, which is nearly all there was in the whole milk, except the butter fat.

"Bread and milk may well be the chief, if not the only, dish in the supper of little children. If the milk is not very rich, the bread should be spread with butter. Use well-baked bread, at least a day old, or toast, or occasionally crackers.

"Thoroughly cooked cereals served once a day for the first course and once a day for dessert encourage the use of milk. Any cereal may be cooked in milk besides being served with it. Skim-milk which might otherwise be thrown away may be used for the purpose. Rice, cooked in an uncovered double boiler, or in a pan in a very 'slow' oven, can be made to absorb about six times its volume of skim-milk. To soak a cupful of rice in this way instead of in water may be considered equivalent, so far as tissue-forming materials are concerned, to serving it with half a pound of lean beef.

Milk gravy may be combined with dried beef or salt codfish which has been cut into small pieces and soaked in warm water, or with small pieces of tender meat, chicken, fish, or vegetables. Such gravy may be served with toast, with baked or boiled potatoes, or with boiled rice or other cereals. Dishes of this kind are more suitable for dinner than for supper.

"Milk toast with the yolk of a hard-boiled egg grated over it makes an attractive dish. The whites of the hard-cooked eggs are not suitable for a young child nor for any child unless they are finely chopped or unless the child can be made to chew them well.

"For variety, milk flavored with cocoa may be served. A warm drink, made chiefly out of cocoa and water, is not to be confused with the more nourishing drink made by flavoring milk with cocoa, but it has its uses. Like clear soups, which contain little food in themselves, it may lead the child to eat freely of bread and other needed foods.

"In some families children do not get enough meat and eggs; in others they get too much. A good general rule commonly followed is to give a child two years old or over, an egg every other day and about the same amount (two ounces) of meat, fish, or poultry on the days that come between. If for any reason meat is omitted from the child's diet special care must be taken to see that other suitable foods take its place—preferably an extra amount of milk or eggs.

"Broiling and roasting are the best methods of preparing tender meat. Tough meat should be stewed or prepared in a fireless cooker, or first chopped and then broiled.

"It is important to teach children to chew meat and other foods properly.

"Fried meats, particularly those which are pan fried or cooked in a small amount of fat, should not be given to young children. One reason for this is that they are likely to be overcooked and tough, at least on the outside, and so are likely not to be properly chewed and to be swallowed in large pieces. Another reason is that the fat used in frying and also that which tries out of the meat is likely to be scorched and changed in composition. When this is the case, it is almost certain to be harmful.

"Eggs are especially useful food for young children. The chief point to remember in preparing them for children is that they must not be overcooked or they are likely to cause indigestion. Everyone knows how the heat of cooking hardens the egg, and it is easy to understand why the digestive juices might have difficulty in penetrating such hard substance as the white of a hard-boiled egg. Overcooked yolks are also hard to digest. The best ways of serving eggs for children are poached, soft-boiled, or coddled, though they may be scrambled for a change if one is careful not to scorch the fat used or to overcook the egg.

"Cereal foods of some sort are used by children practically all over the world. Bread is the commonest cereal food in this country, though cereal mushes are also very generally used. Well-baked bread and thoroughly cooked breakfast cereals are both good for children and with milk should make up a large part of the diet. These two foods, bread and breakfast cereals, provide almost the same kinds of nourishment. Bread may therefore take the place, to a certain extent, of cereal mushes and cereal mushes may take the place of bread, but neither can take the place of milk, meat, eggs, fruits and vegetables.

"An ordinary slice of bread (a three quarter-inch slice cut from an ordinary loaf) is equal in food value to about half a cupful of boiled or steamed cereal and to about a cupful of puffed or flaked cereal. The mother who must feed her child very economically should calculate the cost of each and decide which is cheapest.

"The relation of food to the condition of the bowels is an important matter. Grains, particularly those containing the outer or branny layers or coats, are laxative; so, too, are such mildly acid fruits as apples, oranges and grapefruit. So far, therefore, as the important matter of preventing constipation is concerned, coarse grains and mildly acid fruits serve the same purpose. When fruits are to be obtained in abundance, the kind of cereal served is not of great importance. When they are not, the coarser cereals should be used. In the case of both cereals and fruits, it is possible to overdo.

"Bread cut or torn into small pieces and heated in a very slow oven until thoroughly dried and very delicately browned is good food for children. The warming oven of a coal stove is about hot enough for this purpose. In the case of gas ovens it is often difficult to get the gas low enough without having the door open a little way. The advantage of tearing instead of cutting the bread is that it makes it lighter in texture and easier to eat. The crust can be torn off from all but the ends of a loaf of bread in one piece. This crust should be torn into pieces about two inches wide. The inside of an ordinary loaf of bread will make sixteen pieces of convenient size. Tear first across the loaf and then tear each half into eight pieces. It is usually necessary to make a small cut first in order to start the tearing. It is well to keep the crusts separate, as otherwise they are likely to get too brown. Such bread will need to be reheated before being served unless it is kept in a warm place, like a warming oven. This is also a good way to use stale bread. Some people crush it and use it with milk as a breakfast food.

"Except when used for dessert, cereal mushes and ready-to-eat cereals should be served with milk and with very little, if any, sugar. If the cereals are heavily sweetened, children are likely to eat so much that they neglect other and much-needed foods. If carefully salted, mushes are more likely to satisfy the taste without sugar than otherwise. Well-cooked cereals with milk or stewed fruit or a little molasses, sirup, honey, or sugar make good desserts for dinner, lunch, or supper. If preferred, dried fruits, like dates and raisins, may be cooked with the cereal to sweeten it and to give flavor.

"Fat is an important part of the food of children. Butter, which consists chiefly of separated milk fat, and cream, which is rich in milk fat and also in the other nourishing substances of milk, are both wholesome. Salad oils of various kinds (olive, cottonseed, peanut and others) may be given to children in small amounts. Those who are not used to table oil must often be trained to like it. This can usually be done by introducing it very gradually into the diet. A good way to serve it is on spinach and other greens or on tender salad vegetables.

"There is more than an ounce of fat (at least two and one half level tablespoonfuls) in a quart of whole milk. If the healthy child is given a quart of milk, has butter on its bread, and meat or an egg once a day, he gets enough fat and that which he receives is in wholesome form. It is well, therefore, not to give such fatty foods as pastry, fried meats and vegetables, and doughnuts or rich cakes, for in these the fats are not in so good a form for children, as experience has shown. If the child is constipated, the occasional use of cream or salad oil is desirable, for fat in abundance is laxative.

"Bacon or salt pork, cut very thin and carefully cooked, may be given occasionally but thick pieces with much lean are not desirable.

"Vegetables are an important but often a neglected part of a child's diet. They should be served at least once a day, as they help to keep the bowels in good condition. Several of the ways of accustoming the child to the taste of unfamiliar vegetables have already been suggested here. They may be used as flavoring for soups and stews, may be added to milk or meat stews, or served with meat gravy. If gravy is used, it should not be too fat nor made with scorched fat.

"Young children may be given the young and tender parts of celery and lettuce, a satisfactory way of serving being in the form of sandwiches. For this purpose they should be slightly salted and the celery should be chopped or cut into small pieces.

"All vegetables, whether served raw or cooked, should be washed with great care. Large vegetables like potatoes and carrots should be scrubbed with a brush. Greens should be washed leaf by leaf under running water, or in a large amount of water. To prevent it from again getting on the vegetables lift them from the water instead of pouring the water off.

"Most vegetables when served as a separate dish should be either steamed, boiled, baked, or stewed. If the supply of fresh vegetables is not generous, the juice in which they are cooked should be used with them so far as possible, or put into soups or stews. Experience has shown that vegetables, particularly green vegetables, are at their best when cooked until tender, but not until completely wilted. Spinach requires cooking from twenty to thirty minutes. Vegetables should be served either quite simply or with a little milk, cream, or butter, to improve or vary the flavor. These simple methods are better than complicated ones like frying or scalloping. For the smallest children such vegetables as greens should be finely chopped, and if the tougher portions of other vegetables, the skins of green peas, for example, are found to disagree with a child, these portions should be removed by putting the cooked vegetable through a sieve.

"Fruits are also very important in the child's diet. They supply mild acids and they are important for their flavor, for their laxative effects, and no doubt for other reasons also. This laxative effect is well recognized in the very general use of orange juice, prunes and apples. Then, too, the fruits, like the vegetables, have mineral elements which the body requires.

"Fruits should be served in some form at least once a day. In general, the same rule should be followed as for vegetables in deciding in what form they should be served. Fruit juices and the pulp of cooked fruit, baked apples and pears, and stewed prunes, for example, are safest, whether the skins should be given depends partly on the age and health of the child and partly on the way the fruit is prepared. If the skins are very tender, they are not likely to cause trouble, except with very young children. When apples and pears are baked the skins can be made tender by frequent basting.

"Simple sweets are such things as lump sugar, maple sugar, sirups, honey, and plain candy, and those foods in which sugar is combined in simple forms with fruit juices (in lemonade, water ice, jelly, etc.), with flour or starch, as in plain cakes (cup cake, sponge cake, cookies), and with fruit, as in jams, marmalades, and similar things. Sweets which contain much fat, like rich cakes and pastry, and foods which are made rich with nuts or dried or candied fruits, or those which are highly flavored or spiced, cannot be classed as simple sweets. Sweets should not be given between meals or during the first course of a meal. Careful mothers who forbid their children eating candy at odd times sometimes give one or two pieces of wholesome candy as a 'treat' with dessert at dinner."

No detail is forgotten by "Uncle Sam" in the matter of proper diet for little children, even in regard to the serving. The government experts in this very latest advice and instruction to mothers calls attention to the desirability of having everything served to the children as clean, dainty and attractive as possible. The child relishes his food much better and, relishing it eats more. Sometimes it is difficult to get a child to eat as much as he should.

A dish of oatmeal served in an old cracked, nicked and heat-stained saucer does not appeal at all to the little one. But serve the same food in a little blue saucer with a gilt stripe, or a nursery saucer in colors with figures of animals inside, and with a pretty little spoon, and the youngster will be delighted. Frequently he will eat the cereal very carefully and methodically, just to uncover the pretty pictures.

To eat with pleasure means good digestion. To be constantly urged to eat more, means that the child will not relish his food, and consequently it will not digest as easily. Almost every adult can remember his childhood days when he was scolded because he did not eat more and when he was told to "Eat it all up, at once!" And most of us can remember how hard it was to get some of that food down, how it fairly nauseated us. Scientists have shown us that our mental condition has much to do with digestion. See to it that the child is happy and contented while eating, especially if he be a delicate child with small appetite.

Butterless, Eggless and Milkless Cake

The following recipe was sent in by Mrs. George Scherrer, of Washington, a valued COMFORT subscriber.

One cup brown sugar, one cup cold water, two cups raisins, one third cup lard, one teaspoon cinnamon, one teaspoon salt, one half teaspoon cloves and one quarter teaspoon nutmeg. Put the above in saucepan and boil three minutes. When cool add one teaspoon soda dissolved in a little hot water, two cups flour one half teaspoon baking powder. Bake one hour in slow oven.

I generally double this recipe, grease and line round tin, bake two hours, then cover with a thick icing made of one teaspoon butter, with cream and powdered sugar to right consistency. Flavor with vanilla. This cake, when put in a tin box, will keep from ten to fourteen days.

CHAPTER XII.

ADVENTURES IN MEXICO.

PACKING up and going to their Texas plantation for a quiet, restful, enjoyable summer had become a thing of the past for the Deering family. The habit had just been broken by their year abroad, followed by a season at the seashore and one in Canada, so that when Mrs. Deering suggested their old camp on the Brazos for the summer, between Toughey's sophomore and junior years at college, there was a rather shocked outcry against such a plan. It brought the realization to their mother that the children were growing up; that a handful of shells in the creek bottom, a cardinal's nest in a sumach bush, a ride on their ponies to the cress spring, were no longer day-long, soul-satisfying pleasures. They had begun to ask for more companionship, more color, more movement in their lives. When Toughey made a motion for Mexico at the first meeting of the family to discuss summer plans there was a chorus of "ayes" with only one "no." This was emphatic and came from Mrs. Deering.

"But, mamma," Toughey urged in answer to her objections, "The Highlands of Mexico are delightfully cool."

"Yes, at the sacrifice of many other of the desirable qualities you look for in climate."

"What, for instance," asked Toughey.

"Well, the bracing qualities. You can't take exercise in a climate that owes its coolness to altitude. It exhausts you. Why, even the Indians from the hot countries are larger and stronger and better developed physically than the people who live in the mountains." A famous physician had said this to Mrs. Deering and her own observation and experience had proven it to her. But in the end she was overruled, even Mr. Deering casting his vote against her. So it happened that one over-hot day, the following June, they found themselves headed for the Rio Grande. The observation car was crowded and the breeze that blew from over many miles of cactus and mesquite was surcharged with the dryness of a two months' drought. Even Toughey gasped and for one tortured moment permitted her mind to revert to the cool New England hills Mrs. Deering had advocated for the summer holidays. At the border the family passed through the Custom House with their usual ease, as they never carried contraband. They were never even under suspicion but once, when Nan remarked to her mother, while a New York inspector was digging into one of their trunks at the time of their return from abroad: "Oh, mamma! Suppose he should find something!"

"I shall never understand how we escaped immediate arrest," said Toughey laughing and recalling the circumstance.

"I do," replied her mother, "he didn't find anything."

"Meaning, of course there was nothing to find?" asked Toughey teasingly.

"Meaning that very thing," Mrs. Deering answered firmly, though with a smile. Mr. Deering had always insisted that his wife, like all other women born to this life, was a smuggler. On cross examination he would admit that he never knew what she had smuggled, or could prove that she really ever did, but he could not be made to back down from his theory that smuggling was an inherent vice of women, and that while every other class of criminals was subject to reform, a smuggler could never be redeemed. That this opinion was shared to a certain degree by the Mexican Inspectors seemed apparent, for the train was delayed over an hour while they thoroughly ransacked the numerous trunks, suitcases, bags and baskets belonging to a portly Mexican lady and her two servants. A resident in one of the cities of northern Mexico, with the habit of making frequent trips across the border, she had been for years a suspect, and her belongings never escaped the closest possible scrutiny. Released at last, she returned to the car bursting with rage and denunciation of the inquisitorial and dishonest methods of customs officials. The train finally started again with its load of suffering travelers and it was nine o'clock before the Gulf breeze arrived for their relief.

The following day found them running through one of the best mining regions in Mexico. But the huge smelters to be seen from the car windows were of less interest to the youthful members of the Deering family than the state of the thermometer and they were overly pleased when the train began to climb into the mountains and they could notice the cooling and refreshing of the atmosphere. It was expected that the train would be late in its arrival at Durango and it was; so that the luncheon hour found them still on the way with Bess and Nan hanging out of the car window at a mining camp bargaining with Mexican peons for the "gordos" they offer for sale, at the station. A "gordo" is a kind of developed flapover and is a monument to the skill and resourcefulness of the Mexican woman. Its outer structure is corn-meal. Its interior varies according to the taste and material at the dispos l of the architect. Sometimes it is built of fried pork and "frijoles" (red beans), or chicken and rice with peppers, or some other combination approved by the national standards in cookery. But whatever its constitution may be, it is supposed to contain within itself a balanced meal. To a healthy purchaser, of Catholic taste, it furnishes the pleasing element of surprise; to one of capricious appetite it is a fearsome risk. Toughey and the children, as these big girls were still called by the family, went into their "gordos" with the thrills of gamblers, and laughed at their mother for her unfriendly attitude to the "fat ones."

"Mine is a treasure box," declared Toughey with hungry appreciation.

"Keep it my dear," said her mother with a slight grimace. "It would be squandered on me."

An hour later, as they neared Durango the road passed through rough outcroppings of rock, interspersed with level stretches of prairie dotted with the feathery huisache tree a frequent and beautiful feature of a Mexican landscape on the table-lands. When the trip finally ended at Durango and they stepped from the train to the simple platform constituting the station, they might easily have imagined themselves in the Far East. The shabby, open carriages, the dark-skinned people, speaking a strange language, and the outline of church domes and towers in the distance seemed to belong properly to Egypt or Palestine. These impressions were broken into by Mr. and Mrs. Fenner, some kind American residents of Durango, who had negotiated for them the renting of the house they were to occupy during the summer and presently they found themselves jolting along ill conditioned streets, crossing formidable mudholes, and really arriving, without casualties, at the door of their residence. While Mrs. Fenner rummaged in her handbag for the key to the premises, Toughey and the children, who had jumped eagerly from the carriage, stared at their surroundings with such evident dismay that Mrs. Deering felt inclined to laugh for they had insisted upon Mexico at any price. The country of their dreams was fading out of sight; the real Mexico confronted them.

The street where they stood was narrow and dirty; the swarms of children, noisy and dirty, the shops across the way insignificant and dirty. Mrs. Fenner stood fumbling with the lock of a shabby wooden door let into an irregular length

The Kingdom of Our Birthright

In running this series we are not advocating belief in astrology or faith in the pretended talismanic charm of birth-stones, although these beliefs have persisted from remote antiquity and have not a few devotees even in this present age of reason. Yet as myths and superstitions that have dominated through the ages they possess historic interest and educational value. Miss April will appear with a pleasing message next month.—EDITOR.

MISS MARCH.

THE influence of the zodiacal sign Aries begins with the vernal equinox on the 21st of March and extends to the 19th of April. All persons born between those dates belong to the intellectual part of the grand body of humanity—the head. They use their heads to think and reason with, and their busy brains are the most active organs of their bodies.

They will be called obstinate, when in fact they are not, because they are independent enough to hold to their own ideas until better ones are advanced, when they readily recognize the fact and yield to reason without pride of opinion.

Their nature requires harmony, and under conditions which do not accord with their temperament, their whole existence is out of tune; and for this reason, they must work according to their own methods, not at the dictation of another, nor according to precedent.

They will love the beautiful and have a keen sense of its existence, which explains their ability to trace beauty of thought in a stern, repellent nature.

Their home must possess light, air and sunshine; music will freshen and relax their sometimes over-wrought brains. Excitement and worry will produce nervous disturbances. Quiet, rest and sleep will prove the only restorer; drugs will be useless.

Men born under these influences should marry women who love order, cleanliness and elegance, and for recreation, music and dancing should be cultivated. There must exist however, a certain degree of consistency in all things, else harmony will cease her habitation.

Women born under these influences will do well to cultivate their natural talents, being and doing what nature intended, for if they do not, they will act in confusion and succeed in nothing. This is because constancy, that rare jewel in nature, is very strong with these women, and they must live in good faith with themselves if they give unto others what nature decreed.

Constancy of purpose makes for successful philanthropic work in all its branches, particularly among children and old people, where the work is ha dest and most discouraging and without constancy, will be abandoned.

If these women possess health and a fair amount of strength, they will attain high positions in the business world. Because of their unusual tact they make excellent wives for clergymen and professional men.

Bloodstone the March Birth-stone

Courage, of which the Bloodstone is symbolic, is a quality necessary to every man and woman if they would meet the demands of life with reason and profit. We need but recall the early school days, when we stood before an accusing teacher, to remember that it took courage to confess to disobedience, and still more to maintain our innocence when we knew the result would be to transfer the accusation against a fellow classmate.

As we approach manhood and womanhood, the demand for courage increases, and unless fortified by a strong sense of duty toward parents and self, youth may act with rashness, or follow the ways of least resistance.

Then arises the question, what is courage? And the answer is,—that freedom from being influenced against our better judgment by the opinion of another, constitutes moral courage, and to remain serene and free in the face of danger makes for physical courage.

Conscience, firm resolve, and an ability to distinguish right from wrong, are courage builders, and if we build well, courage will not forsake us when temptation or danger threatens.

In the early days of the Christian Church the bloodstone was venerated as symbolic of the blood of our Lord shed for the salvation of mankind, the noblest example of courage that history records.

Tradition has decreed that the birth-stone for March shall be the bloodstone, and worn as an amulet, to symbolize the daily lesson of courage, it will serve the wearer well.

How to Make Miss March

Saint Patrick was the first missionary priest to Ireland and converted Ireland to Christianity. Among the many stories that have come down to us concerning him is the familiar legend that he miraculously drove all the snakes out of Ireland into the sea, by which the Irish account for the fact that Ireland has no snakes.

COMFORT readers who celebrate St. Patrick's Day, will find a description of Miss March helpful. The shamrock is very similar to our three-leafed clover, and features this costume. Bright green should be the dominant color. As only the head and arms of figure are visible, make them of cloth and fill with cotton. Attach them to waist made the same way and fasten to weighted box so it will stand firmly. Make the turban, waist and skirt with rounded overskirt and plaited kerchief fastened about the shoulders, all of white crepe paper, thus bringing the green paper shamrocks worn at the front of skirt, at the waist and on the cap into bold relief. A snake is made of wire bent into a realistic shape and covered with green crepe paper. This is carried over the right arm.

April Comfort

will be an all-round budget of delight with charming stories that, according to their varied romance, reflect the spring sunshine, exalt the drooping soul with the inspiring spirit of Easter gladness and hope, or with ludicrous predicaments in a comedy of errors provoke a merry laugh; and it will carry a lot of practical, helpful instruction, too.

Special Features for April

"The Sermon on the Mount"—an Easter Romance

A splendid story, by Joseph F. Novak, that tells of a soul courageous, but crushed by adversity, that walked in the "Valley of the Shadow of Death" yet feared no evil because he was sustained by the heroic devotion of the woman at his side.

"An Easter Luncheon"

Tells how to cook and serve an Easter luncheon in approved style, with recipes and directions for decorations.

A Farmer's Wife in the Flower Business

Describes how a farmer's wife managed to market her garden flowers successfully and profitably. A good idea.

"Bulk Versus Package"

Gives valuable and timely instruction in economical selection and buying of food to counteract the high cost of living.

"How to Make Easter Chicks"

Tells and illustrates how to make the pretty little Easter chicks now so much in vogue for decorations. Good amusement for the children.

"Fifteen Minutes of Frightfulness"—a Comic Romance

A winsome widow, a bashful bachelor boarder, and the near tragedy in their affairs that turned out a ridiculous farce but enabled her to slip the noose of matrimony round his shy but willing neck and let him think he had done the courting.

TO the housewife who is obliged to buy a large quantity of food supplies at one time the storage problem often assumes enormous proportions, so Uncle Sam has obligingly come to her rescue, as will be seen in the following article on the storage of food in the home, taken from a Department of Agriculture bulletin.—Ed.

Storage of Groceries, Meats, Cooked Food, and Canned Goods

Flour comes packed both in barrels and in bags, and the form in which it shall be purchased and kept is of importance to the housewife. Bags have certain advantages over the barrel for both producer and consumer; they pack into freight cars with no waste of space, and the cloth for eight bags costs less than one barrel: for the consumer also, it is often convenient to buy in small quantities. But, on the other hand, the bag is too often very flimsy in texture, so that it allows flour to sift out, and is also easily soiled by contact with a damp or dirty floor. The purchaser may well require that the bags be made of good material, so that the contents may be protected from dust and dirt.

On this question Prof. Harry Snyder of the University of Minnesota, says:

There is no question whatever but what flour improves by storage up to six months and it will then hold its own for some time, depending upon the character of the wheat and the thoroughness with which impurities are removed.

As a general proposition it seems certain that it is economical for the consumer to buy flour in bulk rather than in small sacks at a time. In the fall of the year a small sack of flour for trial purposes can be purchased of the grocer and at the same time he can set aside a barrel of the same flour of the same shipment for future delivery, provided the first sample proves satisfactory. As a general rule the price of flour advances from fall to spring sufficient to more than cover the interest item involved and at the same time the consumer is assured of a good quality of flour.

Aside from accidental contamination the chief destructive agencies in stored flour and similar materials are fungi and bacteria. The fungi or molds break down chiefly the starches of the flour, forming organic acids which make the flour sour. The bacterial growths which are present are chiefly forms which liquefy or break down the gluten, the acid presumably aiding in this. This matter has been studied by H. G. Bell, among others, in connection with the problem of commercial storage, and he recommends storage in well-lighted, warm and dry rooms as a preventive of the development of fungi and bacteria, a method as applicable to farm and town homes as to commercial conditions.

The various prepared or "self-raising" flours are more expensive than the mixture that the housewife can easily make by adding the requisite amount of baking powder to flour and sifting it several times. It is a convenience and a saving of time to keep this mixture on hand, as one sifting provides enough for a month's use in cakes and muffins.

The fact that many breakfast cereals that were once sold only in bulk can be bought in packages is a great advantage from a sanitary point of view. The contents of these packages, if bought fresh and if well cared for, will remain in good condition for months. If made in clean factories, such goods have had little chance for contamination from dust and dirt.

If breakfast cereals are bought in bulk they should be kept in tight receptacles in a cool, dry place. Crackers may be kept like breakfast cereals, either in the packages, in which many sorts are marketed, or in tin boxes or in jars.

Corn-meal spoils more readily than flour, and for most families it is best to buy in small quantities.

Rice, tapioca, macaroni and similar dry materials may be kept without any trouble in covered cans or small crocks in a dry, clean place. The same method is advisable for raisins, Zante currants, evaporated and dried fruits, and similar supplies.

Sugar and salt are best kept, the former in tin, the latter in wooden or crockery receptacles.

Glass preserve jars are perhaps the best and most convenient of all containers for small quantities of almost any food material.

Labeling Foods in Packages and Cans

Many otherwise good housekeepers are very indifferent about labeling. They trust to their memory as to what is in each jar or package, and sometimes with disastrous results. All stores should be plainly labeled.—U. S. Dept. of Agriculture.

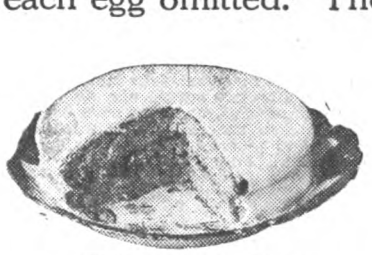
DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT since I was a little girl and this is the first time I have thought of writing.

I know Georgie will feel very much alone in her "opinions" when next month's COMFORT is issued so I want, at least, one letter in her defense.



I think she is much mistaken in regard to her comparison of city and country life so far as sanitary conditions go, but I think she is perfectly right in regard to the city and country child.

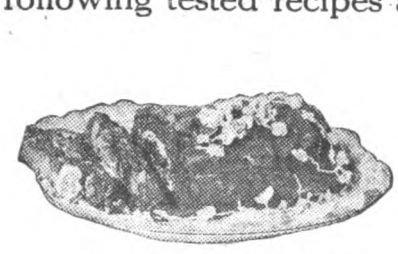
Royal Baking Powder produces appetizing and wholesome cakes, muffins, cornbread, etc., with fewer eggs than are usually required. In many recipes the number of eggs may be reduced and excellent results obtained by adding an extra quantity of Royal Baking Powder, about a teaspoon, for each egg omitted. The following tested recipes are practical examples:—

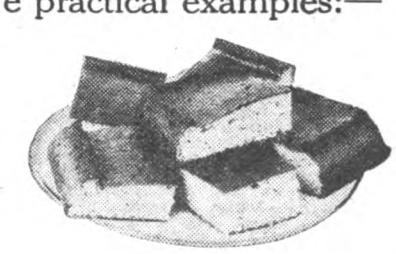


WHITE LAYER CAKE

½ cup shortening
1 cup granulated sugar
⅔ cup water
2 cups flour
3 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder
whites of 2 eggs
1 teaspoon extract

The old method called for 3 eggs

DIRECTIONS:—Cream shortening and sugar together until very light; add water slowly almost drop by drop and beat constantly; add flavoring; stir in the flour and baking powder which have been sifted together twice; fold in the whites of eggs which have been beaten until stiff and dry, pour into two greased layer tins and bake in moderate oven 20 to 25 minutes. Put together with any filling or icing.



CHOCOLATE SPONGE ROLL

1¼ cups flour
½ teaspoon salt
1 cup sugar
2 eggs
2 squares melted chocolate
2 tablespoons shortening
¼ cup hot water
1 teaspoon vanilla
2 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder

The old method called for 4 eggs

DIRECTIONS:—Beat whole eggs. Add slowly sugar, boiling water, and vanilla; stir in melted chocolate and melted shortening without beating. Add dry ingredients, which have been sifted together three times and fold in lightly as possible. Pour into large baking pan lined with oiled paper, and bake in slow oven twenty minutes. When done, turn out on a damp, hot cloth, spread with Royal icing and roll, then cover with chocolate icing.

CORN BREAD

1¾ cups corn meal
¼ cup flour
3 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder
1 teaspoon salt
1 tablespoon sugar (if desired)
2 tablespoons shortening
1½ cups sweet milk

The old method called for 2 eggs

DIRECTIONS:—Sift the dry ingredients into bowl; add milk and melted shortening, beat well, and pour into well-greased pan or muffin tin and bake in hot oven about 25 minutes.

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

IT doesn't necessarily follow that our ancestors must have come from Erin's Isle, or that we are being disloyal to our own particular nationality if we serve a few St. Patrick's Day dishes on our table, the 17th of March—a day beloved of all good Irishmen—or even go to the extent of having the entire decorations carried out in shamrock green with white, since that combination seems to be the best. We might, as a sop to our conscience, say that the very attractiveness of the table is enough to overbalance any race prejudices, and, indeed, with a border of shamrocks and a centerpiece in the form of a harp made of shamrocks, aided and abetted by the St. Patrick's Day dishes, as illustrated below, almost any conscience would be silenced. By placing the stems of white flowers (pinks are particularly good for this) in green dye, very appropriate floral decorations can be obtained.

EMERGENCY SOUP.—Dissolve two and one half teaspoons beef extract in three cups boiling water. Add three tablespoons milk, gradually, to one and one half tablespoons flour to make a smooth, thin paste. Add to the first mixture, stirring constantly until boiling point is reached and let boil three minutes: then add three quarters teaspoon salt, a very small amount of cayenne pepper, and three quarters cup of cream.

SAINT PATRICK'S HAT.—Cover pared Irish potatoes with boiling salted water and cook till fork will just go through. Drain and dry in oven one minute. Mash, season with salt and add enough hot cream to beat light. Keeping the pan while beating on back of stove. Shape to represent high hats, brush over with beaten egg and brown in oven. Make hat bands of parsley or other green.

MARY NORTHEND, Salem, Mass.

HARP CAKES.—Cream two tablespoons of butter with one cup of sugar and add the well-beaten yolk of one egg and one teaspoon of vanilla. Beat well. Measure two cups of sifted flour and add one teaspoon of cream of tartar and one half teaspoon of soda and sift again. Measure one cup of milk and add to egg, alternating with the flour. Lastly add the beaten white of egg. Bake thirty minutes in a shallow pan. Cake should be about one inch thick. When cold cut in oblong pieces and cover with chocolate frosting. Trace with white frosting to represent harp.

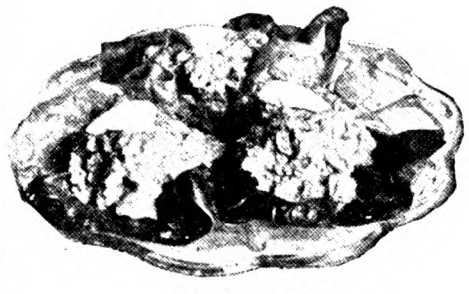
MOCK-BISQUE SOUP.—Take one half can of tomatoes, or as many fresh ones as will make the same quantity and stew them soft enough to strain easily. Scald one quart of milk in a double boiler. Melt a tablespoon of butter in a small pan, cook with it a tablespoon of corn-starch, add enough of the hot milk to make it as thin as cream, then stir into the scalding milk and let cook for ten minutes. Add two tablespoons more of butter, stir until well mixed, season with salt and pepper, add a pinch of soda to the tomatoes, and stir in the last thing. Serve with crackers or small squares of bread, toasted. The soda should prevent the tomatoes curdling the milk. If it should curdle, however, a few brisk whirls with the egg beater will make it all right. Serve hot.

BLACK BEAN SOUP.—Wash one pint black turtle beans, drain, cover with cold water and let soak over night. In the morning drain and cook slowly two hours in three pints of boiling water in covered kettle. Add one level teaspoon of salt, a little pepper and one quart of stock. Rub all through a colander and then through a sieve. Rinse kettle, bring soup to a boil in it. Slice thin two hard boiled eggs and one lemon. Serve in the boiling soup. Bread sticks are a good accompaniment.

SPINACH BALLS.—Equal bulk of finely chopped spinach that has been seasoned, and very fine dry bread crumbs. Season highly with pepper, salt and cayenne. Add enough white of egg to moisten well, then set aside to stiffen. Shape in balls, size of hickory nut; poach in hot soup for five minutes, and serve three or four to each plate of soup.



SMOTHERED LIVER AND BACON.—Fry eight thin slices of bacon until brown, and remove from pan. Place in the hot fat one pound of liver seasoned with salt and dredged in flour. When the liver is brown on one side, turn it over and on the top place the bacon and two large onions, sliced thin. Cover for about five minutes on hot fire. Add one pint of water and keep simmering, while tightly covered, for fifteen minutes.

BAKED HALIBUT, SPANISH STYLE.—Have a slice of halibut weighing two pounds cut three inches thick. Place in a buttered pan, cover with one cup of tomatoes, canned, or three fresh ones, one thinly sliced onion, one chopped green pepper, salt, pepper, one cup of water and one quarter cup of butter. Bake slowly till fish is done and serve with the vegetables.

BAKED SALT MACKEREL.—Soak two small mackerel in cold, fresh water for six hours or longer; then rinse, wipe dry and squeeze a little lemon juice over the flesh side of the fish. Lay one of the fish on a buttered cloth or tin in a baking pan, cover with a dressing made of bread crumbs seasoned with parsley, butter, salt, pepper and lemon juice or thin yellow rind; put the other fish on this dressing and bake, basting often with melted butter and hot water. When well browned remove to a hot platter, cover the top with bread crumbs moistened with butter and set in oven just long enough to brown.

SHAMROCK PEAS.—An appropriate and attractive dish for Saint Patrick's Day is made of toast, peas and parsley. Drain thoroughly canned peas, add butter, pepper and salt, and let come to a scalding heat in a double cooker. Take slices of stale bread one-

Kneeling down, she tried the keyhole with a long hairpin. It went easily through. A cold wind blew on her face through the keyhole as she knelt, and all was dark. Could she have imagined that the room only this morning was warm and smelling of flowers—and brandy?

She got up angrily and went over to the window, opening it a crack, so that if anything happened to the fastening of the door she could enter the room at a pinch from the outside. Then she walked off to her bedroom. Thank goodness, she had not mentioned her little tour of investigation to any of the others!

CHAPTER VIII.

A MYSTERIOUS STRANGER.

"MY DEAR BOBBY:

"I am thinking of running in upon you for a day or two next week on my way up to town. I am changing some of the furniture in my own rooms, and shall spend a few days with your Aunt Julia while I hunt up the curtains and coverings which are in my mind's eye. You might get rooms for me and for Hooper at the hotel if it is comfortable. I shall only stay the night unless you offer me some attraction. Let me know if I am to bring you anything; also, if I am likely to be a nuisance to you, in which case I shall go direct to Aunt Julia. Ever, my dearest boy, your affectionate mother, D. SATTERLEE."

Lord Satterlee put down the above epistle with mingled emotions.

"If she likes them, it's the very thing. If she doesn't——" He whistled softly as he sat by the fire in his own quarters. His mother was one of the most charming and "thorough" (to use his own word for her) of women; but what man, what son even, could venture to predict the emotions of any woman suddenly confronted with two strange girls and coolly requested to chaperon them and their unknown proclivities to a dance given by four young men? No wonder Lord Satterlee whistled! "Best make hay while the sun shines," he reflected, not too hopefully. His mother was extremely fond of Maurice Lispenard, but she had a way of liking nice boys. That might go for nothing when his sisters were concerned.

He looked out at the weather; it was raining hard. Then he looked at the date of his mother's note; the day before yesterday.

Rooms at a hotel there would be no trouble about; there was a very good hotel. He would go and make arrangements at once and then send a telegram.

It did not take him long to get into plain clothes, nor to button himself up to the chin in his mackintosh. As he drove through the streaming rain into Highbury he grew more cheery. After all, what could promise better for the success of his dance than this maternal visit?

He inspected the best rooms at the comfortable hotel with a growing hope. They were very good indeed. The sitting-room gave him visions of tea parties—Lady Satterlee never stirred from home without her beloved tea things; he could get some palms and lamp shades and things; and perhaps she might "take to" the Lispenards as much as he himself had done.

He sent off his telegram with a boyish satisfaction. Then he looked at his watch. It was only four o'clock. He wished he could with decency present himself at the twins' tea table, but he could not find courage to go without an invitation two days running.

As he stood buttoning his gloves in the hotel doorway, divided in his mind whether to take a constitutional in the rain or to go down to the club and play pool, he caught sight of a tall and shapely young person, wearing an extremely shabby waterproof and a glazed sailor hat, and walking through the driving rain without apparently the least wish for an umbrella.

Lord Satterlee looked for a full minute in amazement. What could Lispenard be thinking of to let his sister out in such weather? Was it his Miss Lispenard or was it the other one?

Whichever it was, she stopped in front of the pastry cook's opposite, giving a little shake like a wet dog to the disreputable waterproof. Then she vanished into the shop.

Lord Satterlee marched across the wet street and went in also. Nerine, standing in her ancient waterproof, gave a dismayed start as she saw him. Why had she put on her very worst pair of gloves, impelled by mistaken economy? There was a hole in them—they were wet—disgusting! In hot despair she was compelled to put out one of them—very limply—into Satterlee's outstretched fingers.

"What are you doing here?" he said, wonderingly, ignoring the wet, torn glove, the wetter mackintosh. "What a day for you to be out!"

"That is the very reason. I was so tired of the house, and a country walk would have been really too muddy. Also," as the shopman approached with a small parcel, "Miss Belton wanted some sweets and so did I." She put Kit's half-crown on the counter with the best glove as she spoke.

"Let's see, isn't this place rather famous for confectionery, or cakes, or something?"

Nerine assented, slipping her parcel into her pocket. "Wedding cakes," she said, "and others, too. The Princess of Wales once ordered a cake here, Mr. Mayne says."

"Then I do not see why I should not follow the example of royalty!" He turned to the shopman.

"I want to see some of your cakes—your best cakes, if you please. By the way, Miss Lispenard," as the man went away, "who is Mr. Mayne?"

"My stepfather," with a preoccupied frown. "Tell me, why are you wasting your money on a cake? You will never eat it!"

"Why not?" quite undaunted. "I am going to ask you to let me drive you home, and I sincerely hope you will feel obliged to invite me in to tea. Then you will see whether or not I can eat cake!"

"But——" Nerine stammered, "I don't think I want to drive home with you! I came out to walk."

Satterlee looked at her.

"Was it raining in this manner when you left home?" he inquired, dryly.

"No," rather unwillingly, "but, all the same, I don't think I ought to drive home with you."

"I don't think you ought to walk home. If you do you will hurt my feelings very much, to say nothing of getting very wet."

Nerine did not answer. She was gazing at the appalling size of the cake which was being done up for her unwelcome companion.

Satterlee laughed as he caught her eye.

"You would not compel me to walk home with that, Miss Lispenard. Seriously, you will let me drive you? The rain is much worse than it was, and you will be drenched if you walk."

"Very well," with a gentleness very foreign to her, "if you really would like to come in to tea," blushing a little.

Satterlee flushed in his turn as he answered her.

"Honestly, I was seeking an excuse to go to see you when I caught sight of you coming in here. I wonder if they are doing up my cake in a water-tight manner?"

He walked to the other side of the shop to pay for it and to see it sent out to his trap. How Nerine's economical soul would have stood aghast had she seen the good hard gold that was given for that frost-covered mountain.

Blissfully unconscious and forgetful even of her gloves, she let Satterlee help her into the high dogcart and button the leather apron over her.

The rain was behind them; the air seemed to have grown warmer. Nerine had never driven in so high a cart or behind a horse that stepped so fast. She took a sidelong glance at Satterlee, at his clear, straight profile, his little gold mustache, and found him very good to behold.

But what, she wondered, would Agatha say when she drove up to the gate with him? Nerine had never in her life been driven by a young man in a high dogcart, and she was not easy in her mind about doing it now.

They were at Lispenard Hall in less than no time; Satterlee had lifted her down, sent away his trap, and was following her into the hall, with his big cake in both hands, almost before Nerine had realized that they had started.

It was a pleasant, home-like scene Nerine opened the morning-room door upon—the glowing fire, the snowy tea table, Agatha stretched out in a comfortable chair, toasting herself in the cheerful glow. Agatha in her velvet gown, with idle white hands.

Satterlee for the first time felt that his cake might perhaps be too bold a stroke of genius. What if Miss Lispenard were offended? Confound the thing! How should he ever explain about it?

Agatha looked up in surprise as she saw the pair in the doorway, the enormous white parcel very conspicuous against Nerine's dripping garments.

"What in the world——" she began; then with late politeness, "How do you do, Lord Satterlee? Nerine, is that a—a washtub?"

"Not at all," briskly; "it's a cake."

"Where did you get it?" said Agatha, rather faintly. She had caught sight of the name of the shop on the parcel, and a dreadful vision of the bill, which must infallibly be sent in for it—Nerine had no money but Kit's half crown—well nigh overcame her. She shot a glance of horror at her twin-sister. It was all very well to gloss over their poverty, but to buy a cake like that simply to be grand before Lord Satterlee was a little too extravagant. "We had lots of cake, Nerine!"

"Don't," said Lord Satterlee, with undignified haste. "I—it's my cake!"

Agatha stared at him in silence.

"I met your sister in the shop when I was buying it, and I deliberately asked her if I might bring it here to be eaten. Of course," with humility, "I knew you had lots of cake."

"We haven't—like that!" Nerine remarked, composedly. "Agatha, you tell Jane to bring tea while I take my wet things off." She vanished as she spoke, letting the door close behind her.

Satterlee still stood just within it, his cake in his hands.

"Miss Lispenard, tell me, you don't mind my idiocy about the cake? They told me," artfully, "that it was a very good cake."

"I think you are the most absurd person I ever heard of!" Agatha began, primly, and then caught his eye—such a blue, half-wheedling and half-plaintive eye over the expanse of parcel, that she laughed.

Satterlee laughed, too, with a large measure of relief. Miss Lispenard was a much more awe-inspiring person than her sister, and he had not liked the way in which she had greeted his cake.

"Then I may put it down," joyfully. "It weighs a ton. I thought I would have enough wedding cake for once in my life!"

"Wedding cake!" Agatha cried. She moved hastily to the table and pulled off the wrappings. "You don't mean you and Nerine really bought a wedding cake!"

Satterlee nodded. She looked so magnificently handsome, standing behind the enormous bride cake, pulling the papers away from it with slim white fingers, that a quick, audacious thought came to him.

He had once been best man to a friend of his in a line regiment; he remembered how the bride had cut the cake with her husband's sword.

"Miss Lispenard," he said, softly, "will you cut my wedding cake for me?"

"Oh, yes," unsuspiciously. Then, with a quickly withdrawn glance and a reddening cheek, "that is, presently. It's not time yet; we must wait for the others."

"All right—we'll wait. But mind, it's a promise," with a look he had never given to the richer beauty of her twin sister. But then, he had never sat gazing at that twin sister through long morning services at St. Jude's.

Up-stairs Nerine was making a more careful toilet than she had ever done in her life; recoiling her damp black hair, arranging her old silk gown with unwonted care, and humming a tune under her breath the while. What a nice afternoon she had had, in spite of the wet! And how well cropped yellow hair could look in the rain! She laughed outright as she thought of Agatha's face when she saw that cake.

It had grown dusk while she was dressing; when she was quite ready she peered about the room for a package of Everton taffy she had bought for Kit. She remembered then that she had taken it out of her pocket in the pantry, whe she had gone to waylay Jane for hot water. Gathering her long skirts in her hand, Nerine ran lightly down the back stairs to the pantry. As she entered some one left it by the door leading into the dining-room.

"Oh, Jane, wait a minute," Nerine cried, hurrying after her. "What did you do with my parcel?"

Jane stopped, gave a single backward glance, and then ran. There were no two ways about it. She had something under her arm, but it was too big for Nerine's parcel.

"Is Jane going cracked, I wonder?" Nerine exclaimed with some indignation, and a more indignant, if respectful, voice from behind answered her:

"No, miss! I'm sure I hope not. What were you pleased to want? I gave the parcel to Miss Agatha with the tea things."

Substantial Jane stood behind her in the door by which Nerine herself had entered.

"Do you mean," cried the latter, "that you did not go into the dining-room from here and run when I called you?"

Jane's eyes flashed.

"I was in my kitchen, Miss Nerine."

"Then who on earth was it?" with an uncomfortable recollection of that door at the end of the passage. "It was not either of the young ladies."

"Nor was it me, miss," doggedly. "It was Mr. Maurice, very like."

"Very like," with unconscious mimicry. If Maurice was dressed in a dark gown and was of much the same stout country build as Jane, very likely it was he. "You are sure, Jane, that it wasn't you I saw?" she persisted.

But Jane had retired in dudgeon.

"There's something strange going on in this house, I'm certain," mused her mistress, "and I believe Jane knows what it is, or why did she get so angry at an ordinary question?"

She looked at the huge dining-room, growing dark in the twilight; thought of the comfortable morning-room, the fire, the cake, Satterlee and the other three gathered within its comfortable walls.

"I shall just look in Mr. Mayne's room before I go to tea!" she decided. "Perhaps it was Jones I saw in a long coat, or something. He may be there now!"

CHAPTER IX.

NERINE'S STRATEGY.

The door from the corridor was tightly shut. Nerine had rather expected to find it so, and was the more certain that the vanishing figure had not been imaginary, but someone who had taken care to cover his or her exit.

She retraced her steps till she came to the front door, and then ran bareheaded through the rainy dusk round the house, so close under the windows that the cheerful tea party in the morning-room did not see her. Mr. Mayne's windows had outside shutters; they were closed, and Nerine passed them bravely. The windows of Mrs. Mayne's room were low to the ground; it did not take her long to open the one she had left ready and slip through.

The room was empty, dark and cold, as usual, but through the crack of the door into Mr. Mayne's room came a clean shaft of lamplight. The door was well ajar, and Nerine stopped short, trembling. If whoever was there had heard her entrance, she probably had all her trouble for nothing.

"If it is Jones or Jane—impertinent wretches!" she thought, as she went slowly forward in shoeless feet, "what a tempest in a teapot I will have discovered."

She reached the door. There was a wide crack at the hinges; she could see quite well into the middle of the room.

At the sight which met her she all but spoke aloud! She had been panting a moment before, but in her excitement now her breath seemed to come quite easily. On the table, spread out helter skelter, was a very respectably sized collection of Lispenard silver. There were spoons, jugs and a small punch bowl, a couple of teapots, some nondescript trifles, and a tankard.

Within the range of Nerine's vision stood a stoutish woman, whose back was turned to the unseen watcher. Quite certain of being alone and unseen since the baize-covered door into the passage was so carefully fastened and barricaded on the inside—she was leisurely doing up the Lispenard silver, piece by piece, in paper and stowing it into a leather bag before her.

"If I could only see her face, to know her again, I might go back for Maurice," Nerine thought in impotent rage. But she would hear me! She'd be gone by the time we got back, and so would the silver!"

She peered determinedly through the crack. She wronged Jones for once; the woman was alone; Nerine was certain she had never seen her before. Heavens! how fast her own silver was going into that bag!

"I will get it from that beast! I'm sure I can." She felt her own strong young wrists and looked at the fat, dumpy hands of the thief. Suddenly she shrank back from the telltale light which came through the crack of the door; she flattened her strong young physique in its dark dress against the wall; the strange woman had left the table and come to the door where Nerine stood.

For a moment she gazed absently into the dark room.

"There! I'm about ready," she remarked, calmly. "When Clarence comes back he'll find I've not forgotten much especially when he's blamed for it, as I pray he will be! I'll go and put on my bonnet now and be off from this place for good. He might drop in on me any day!"

She turned back into the sitting-room and went into the dressing-room adjoining. The bedroom where she must have been sleeping was, as Nerine well knew, behind that again.

A bold plan came into the girl's head. Oh, for one instant of time to execute it! With quick fingers she slipped off her long silk skirt.

On a table in the room where she was lay a collection of Canadian stones and minerals. If she could only find them in the dark!

It would never do for Nerine to bear off the bag bodily. In the first place, she could not get it out of the window, and then the woman might seize her as she was trying the complicated catch of the baize door. Somehow she shuddered at the thought of a bodily struggle with a woman like the one so near her. No; it must be the min

Efficiency in the Kitchen

By Mary Clara Huntington

EFFICIENT kitchens have become an absolute necessity. Efficiency must be the key-note, efficient work, efficient rest and elimination of all unnecessary work, and the doing of the necessary work in the easiest and most economical way. These are the problems of every housewife; there are four main requisites for all kitchens, storage place for supplies, a work table, proper arrangements for cooking and facilities for dish washing and cleaning. These needs must be met in any kind of kitchen for a family of any size. The concentration of all the working processes near together, and in convenient relation to one another saves hours of time, by preventing useless steps and unnecessary motions. Kitchen work is not a series of isolated tasks, but one task must be fitted into another if we are to do an effective day's work; our stove, sink, work table and supplies must be near enough together so that we can "keep an eye" on one thing while we are doing another. We can work effectively just in proportion as we use skill in planning and arranging our work.

Awkward, poorly arranged kitchens can be made into efficient workrooms at a small expense by having the working materials and utensils grouped in a way that helps the working instead of hindering it. Keep nothing in your kitchen that you do not use every day. Have plenty of narrow shelf room and keep only one row of articles on each shelf, things used oftener should be conveniently near at hand. Shelves should be at a reasonable height, none lower than twelve inches, and none higher than can be easily reached.

Fixed equipments should be placed where the light is good, and at a convenient height for the worker. There should be shelves, closet room, or hooks for all kitchen utensils. A broad work shelf instead of a table is a great convenience, this should be, if possible, built along the entire width of the kitchen, the space underneath may be utilized partly for drawers and part of it may be be closed in to hold some of the more bulky parts of the kitchen equipment.

Some housekeepers prefer to keep all of their kitchen utensils on shelves or in drawers, while others like to hang everything possible on the walls. For hanging large articles on the wall a square or L shaped hook with a shank about one inch long is best; for smaller pieces hooks of the same shape about three quarters of an inch long will do. For things to be hung from the under side of a shelf, table or cabinet round cup-hooks of suitable sizes are required. Use only brass hooks—never iron or steel hooks, as these will rust.

There should be a special place for each article in the kitchen, and the place should be selected with reference to the purpose and convenient use of the article. This applies to cooking materials as well as to utensils, and both classes should be grouped accordingly. Those which are used together or in successive stages of the same process should be grouped within easy reach from one position in order to save steps. Some utensils and some materials are used two or even three times a day and they should be located more accessibly than such as are needed only occasionally. Have a suitable place for everything and then keep everything in its place.

Nothing should be permitted to rest on the floor, thus making it an easy matter to keep clean. The open shelf system has the advantage that we can put them where they are needed, while the closed in closet must be put where the doors will not be in the way. Narrow shelves offer many advantages over deep shelves, for there is room for but one row of articles, thus avoiding the danger of knocking things off the shelf, and breaking them, when reaching for the second row. In this way we save time and energy due to awkward movements.

There should, if possible, be a special closet for the cleaning things. If this is not possible have a cleat three inches wide nailed to the wall five feet five inches above the floor; another cleat three feet high for dustpan, brush and so forth, these articles should have screw eyes fastened to the end and should always be hung on hooks when not in use. As all of these implements are in constant demand they should be readily at hand.

Wherever a wood or coal stove is in use there should be a place near the stove for a small reserve of fuel; it should not be necessary to go to the coal bin but once a day, if there are two separate coal hods. Gas, kerosene and alcohol stoves are all easier to care for, and are less expensive to operate than coal or wood. It is important to suggest here the advantage of having a wide zinc-covered shelf on which to keep the large supply can of kerosene or alcohol; this should be about twelve inches wide and two feet from the floor, and should be put in a perfectly safe place.

If the kitchen floor is not hard wood, a painted floor is good. Fill the cracks with a crack filler and give it two coats of shellac before the paint is put on, then two coats of floor paint in tan, grey, or red. When worn spots appear they should at once be touched up. A linoleum will give satisfactory results. The best grade ranges from one dollar and sixty cents to one dollar and seventy cents per square yard. If properly laid and cared for it will last twenty years. To lay a linoleum is the work of an expert and should never be attempted by the amateur. It should be kept clean with warm water and a soft, clean cloth. Water should not be used in quantity for if it is allowed to get under the surface, it causes serious damage. Hard wood is more important for the woodwork in the kitchen than any other room in the house for it gets such hard wear and needs so much cleaning. The wood should be treated with turpentine stain and then waxed. A varnish finish is durable, but the effect is not as good. Pine wood should be covered with paint. White enamel is very attractive but it demands daily care, and will need renewing often. It is not to be recommended for households where labor must be economized. Tan or gray paint is much better.

In the treatment of walls one must be guided by their condition: if these are well preserved paint or tint them, either of which is very clean and sanitary. Wallpaper should never be used unless it is of the washable oilcloth variety. These come one and one half yards wide, costing twenty-six cents per yard. Paint for from one to two coats costs, four and a half cents each coat, while kalsomine, one or three coats costs per square yard, one cent each coat. If the walls are cracked they should be filled with plaster of Paris and touched up with shellac before putting on the kalsomine.

While a full equipment of necessary kitchen utensils is essential to efficiency and to the saving of time, strength and labor, an accumulation of superfluous contraptions in the kitchen is a nuisance to be avoided. Nevertheless, keep your outfit up to date by adding or substituting the most improved kitchen ware and implements to enable you to handle your work in the best and easiest way.

Labor saving is disposition saving, not only for the tired mother of insufficient means who needs convenient arrangement so that serious waste of time and labor may be avoided, but for the home maker of abundant means as well. To create an efficient kitchen, one must plan the saving of time and steps in every detail of the work to be done there. To the attainment of this purpose and the elimination of unnecessary drudgery, the location of the stove, sink, work table, the shelves, closets, cabinet and lockers with regard to their convenient use and relatively to the doors and windows is a matter of importance requiring careful consideration and planning on the part of the busy housewife who would gain the little daily leisure and rest requisite to conserve her health, brighten her eyes, restore the roses to her cheeks, sharpen her wits, bring cheer to her heart and an optimistic smile to her lips, and withal make her the light of the home.

Even She Had Corns

Until a Little While Ago She Thought Them Unavoidable

If you have corns don't blame yourself too much. Many an old person has had them fifty years.

Yet they have done what you do—pared them and used old-time, useless treatments.

But what folly it is when nowadays about half the world keeps free.

Just try one corn.

Apply a Blue-jay plaster in a jiffy. Then forget it. It will never pain again.

In two days take the plaster off. The corn will disappear. Only one corn in ten needs another application.

The cost is five cents per corn. The trouble is a moment. The results are sure.

You will laugh at the old ways when you try Blue-jay. You will wonder why people ever let corns hurt. Please start tonight. You have suffered long enough.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

and I know younger children than I, told me things that a grown person should not know and things that I had never heard in the city schools.

Ignorance and bashfulness among country children is mistaken by most people for innocence and the city child by coming in contact with people more and knowing more of current events, naturally seems more precocious than a child should and so the general opinion is that city children are too "knowing" and the country children are innocent.

I dislike hearing a child bring forth his opinions when older people are talking but parents should teach their children to learn all they can, and until they are of a proper age to take part in discussions "to be seen and not heard."

I am twenty-two years of age and have been married only a little over a year and as I have gotten most of my household hints from COMFORT I have none to offer.

I hope our country sisters will not take great offense to Georgie's and my opinion but will take more interest in their children's morals and not so much in money making. That is the cause of the depravity among the children for they are just left to "grow" as Topsy did.

Wishing Mrs. Wilkinson and the COMFORT sisters success, I remain. "HOPEFUL."

WASHINGTON, D. C.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I am writing my first letter to one of the most helpful departments in COMFORT. I am very much interested in the sisters' letters and get a good deal of advice from them.

Mrs. Pete's letter especially interested me. If I were Mrs. Pete, I would try and get my husband interested in my friends by having more of them visit at my home. Perhaps your friends are not to his liking. Why not invite more of his friends to your house? Perhaps when you visit and have your good times, the things you do and talk about do not interest him. If I were she I would try to go where my husband liked to go or entertain at home. Many women would only be too glad of a chance to stay at home with their husbands.

The letter of Miss Evangeline Doble was interesting and I agree with her about not remarrying after divorce.

I would like to say a word or two about reading. I think that people should try to read the best of books. Don't we read enough of crime and misery in the newspapers without reading the cheap dime novels? I admit that they are sometimes interesting. They cannot hold your attention long and soon after you have read it, you forget it. While if you read good literature, you can recall the main characters and incidents. I think Mary Johnston's books are very good and I am sure everyone who has read "Janice Meredith" by P. L. Ford enjoyed it. The good libraries in the cities enable one to read the best of books without purchasing them. In Washington, there are two fine libraries, the Congressional with its millions of books and the Carnegie Library.

Lately I have been keeping a list of books I have read and that I want to read. Will not the sisters who remember some book that they especially liked, please tell me about it in this column.

With best wishes to Mrs. Wilkinson and the sisters, I remain. "FRANCES MAE."

Frances Mae. There is a good deal of sound, common sense in your advice to Mrs. Pete; but the subject is still open for the opinion of others. A discussion of worth-while books seems to be one of the best ways of helping each other, and I am glad you started the ball rolling by mentioning some of your favorite books and authors. People living in remote country districts cannot of course, take advantage of free libraries to such an extent as city dwellers but they can start a library of their own; and particularly if there are children in the home would I advise this for the cultivation of the reading habit is one means of keeping children and young folks home more, and really books aren't so very expensive when you stop to consider the advantages and results obtained. A dictionary, a set of reliable encyclopedias, a few historical and scientific books and a set of nature studies are a great help to school children, and everyone else in fact, and make a fine beginning for a library, but don't confine yourself too closely to books of that sort as fiction of the right kind is as necessary to allround mental growth. Let the boys make a bookcase, and encourage both girls and boys to buy their own books with money they earn, only let the choice rest with them, though it may be well to start them in the right direction by a few words of advice or warning, carefully given, so they won't realize it.—Ed.

POST, OREGON.

DEAR COMRADES:

I am not a bit frightened over the terrible consequences Miss Scott seems to think will overtake those of us who have let our children believe in dear old mythical Santa (sometimes folks stand up so straight they fall over backwards). My children are all grown; big, hearty, frank-faced, truthful men who don't hesitate, to give (to them) the best mother in the world a regular bear hug with a kiss; they know I am not a liar. I'm truly sorry for anyone who is without imagination.

In my opinion to whip a child to make it say its prayers would be very wrong. A friend of mine made her little son go to Sunday school every Sunday, rain or shine as long as she had authority over him, then he stopped and will not attend either church or Sunday school. We often took our lunch and went out in the woods by the river and spent Sunday, although our oldest son was organist in Sunday school and missed only two Sundays in two years. I don't think it hardly fair, he should have had a Sunday off occasionally.

I prefer the city school to the country; the best teachers do not always like to go into the country, although they sometimes do. But where I live we are fifty miles from a railroad, people live from one mile to three apart and very few children, about three bachelors to every family. Often though teachers are holding down a homestead and also teaching at the same time.

We are living on a three hundred and twenty-acre homestead in central Oregon. This part and eastern Oregon are as different from western and southern Oregon as the two latter parts of the country mentioned is different from Iowa. The winters here are dry and cold, with snow. There it is warm with much rain. This is a stock country but as it is being settled up will gradually work into agriculture. They raise wheat, oats, barley, rye and Alfalfa and fine vegetables of the hardy varieties. We are about four thousand feet elevation, some much higher; the mountains are covered with pine timber mostly, hardly any underbrush, it is like riding through a park (I enjoy horseback riding as thoroughly as I did at eighteen.) In western Oregon the Douglas fir is the principal timber, but there is also much cedar, hemlock, spruce and pine; also a thick growth of undergrowth. There we find numerous cold springs and fine running streams. Here the springs are trampled into mud by the stock, not many running streams. One from western Oregon misses the fruits and flowers. Fruit can be grown here but few have planted. People do not visit much, the stranger not at all, as a rule they are unwelcome as the coming of the homesteader means the closing up of the open range whereby these earlier settlers have made their stake.

Women suffrage will yet be universal, the sooner the better. Some talk as though the act of voting would change a woman's nature, after once voting she would be entirely different; as for time, the most time anyone could possibly put in would certainly not be over twenty minutes. I think I was about ten minutes. One thing I do know in my home town the women who worked against Woman Suffrage were on hand to vote when they had a chance; two women who were especially bitter against the measure acted as judges on the election board. Sometimes I "kinder" think these women should have waited about five years before they could cast a ballot.

I expect it is time for me to quit, no doubt I will get into trouble over this call, and it is my first one. We are homesteading here; thought while Uncle Sam's land was going we would get our share. Fifty miles from a railroad is quite a ways but we have auto stages and daily mail. We are thirty miles to the nearest town. "No place to go but out. Nowhere to come but in."

To me every one who writes, whether old or young is good looking. I pay no attention to description, I was a "grama" at forty-five. The "children and their paw" think I'm good looking any way. If anyone wants a description I will give it should I ever call again. I am a native Oregonian. Mother was born in Illinois, her name was Veatch, father, Hamilton Wallace in Missouri.

Best wishes to all. FRANCES E. MORSS.

ARKANSAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Will you admit a little Arkansas girl into your happy circle? I have seen several letters from the Great Bear state but never one from this part. My mother and other members of the family have been subscribers to COMFORT since I was a small child. I have always enjoyed reading the cousins' letters and Uncle Charlie's witty answers but have never before become much interested in the Sisters' Corner.

I certainly agree with "Mossback" and "California Voter" in regard to Woman Suffrage. I think that every intelligent woman should have the right to help make the laws whereby she must abide and rear her family. The women of Arkansas have not yet been given the right to vote, but the day is coming, and very soon too, when we will stand side by side with the men in making our laws.

Georgie, I certainly do not agree with you in your opinions of country life. I am a little country girl, being born and reared in the country and I thank God for that blessing, for such I certainly consider it. I think a child reared in the country is by far better fitted to meet and bear the responsibilities of life. One never knows what misfortune is in store for them. The boy or girl on the farm can acquire a good, practical education if they will only make use of their time in our little country schools. We have a great free school system in Arkansas. A child can attend the free school from the age of six to twenty-two; and while our boys and girls are getting their practical education they can easily work at farming, dairying, stock raising and many other things whereby they can earn money for a high school, business college or college education. They can do this during vacation time.

We have our county health officer who comes out and visits our country schools and sees that they are perfectly sanitary in every way. The individual drinking cup is in use all over Polk county.

I hardly think it depends on where the child lives as to its innocence. It depends wholly on how the child is reared, for when you hear a little child talking indecently you may know that he has heard older people talking the same way or has heard other children who have heard it from their elders. Sister, is your city so clean that your children will never hear a vulgar word or an oath? If so, methinks every one will be moving to that city.

The general opinion of the world is that country life is the cleanest, purest, most upright life to be lived. The young men of our country all say, "Give me the country girl, raised by one of the South's dear, old-fashioned mothers." They say the city girls know very little about caring for a home and they do not, as a rule, make suitable companions.

As to nature, I believe in making a study of it, for is it not a gift from our Creator?

There are six of us children and we are all healthy, happy and free. We all have good educations. I am teaching school. Father and mother have tried to raise us to live upright, Christian lives. We are all obedient and have been taught to do all kinds of farm work and we girls can do all kinds of housework. We are all very heathful, have never had a case of severe sickness among us.

I trust no one will be vexed with me for my opinions. I always speak my mind freely when I feel it my duty.

I will close by giving a description of myself. I am twenty-four years old, have black hair, dark blue eyes, fair complexion, am five feet, seven inches tall and weigh one hundred and twenty-one pounds.

With love and best wishes to dear Mrs. Wilkinson and all the sisters, ARKANSAS SISTER.

Arkansas Sister. While COMFORT'S circulation is largely among the country and small town people, there are, a number of subscribers in the cities and I have a feeling that some of the city girls will resent your attitude toward them and come forth with arguments in their own behalf; anyway, all are equally welcome.—Ed.

TOMPKINSVILLE, KY.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Through the kindness of my sister, COMFORT will be sent to me one year and I am very thankful to her for the kindness. I enjoy reading the Sisters' Corner, but never read the stories.

We live in the country and like that life. My husband of course is a farmer. We raise all kinds of vegetables. He owns an eight H. P. gasoline engine that he uses for grinding corn and drilling wells; also a two H. P. engine that saws wood.

We have never lived in the city and don't think we would care to. I agree exactly with Mrs. Bauer about farm life. I am twenty-nine years old and my husband is twenty-eight. We have been married a little over six years and have three children living, Floyd, Euren and Alene. I enjoy the letters on child training for we are trying to teach ours in the right way, and do hope and pray that they will come and share in the life and grace of Christ. And I believe they will when once they are made to realize how great a blessing they are missing by staying away. We are Baptists, and by living the gospel ourselves we best advertise its worth to others, in one way or another. The professor of Christ's religion ought to make it known to his fellowmen and then if it is rejected they will not be to blame. We are not responsible for results but for our own work but we should give our best.

I agree with Mrs. Lovelace on the idea of starting a bank account for the children. We began giving Floyd all our pennies when he was one year old and now he has over three dollars. His uncle gave him one dollar and we mean to put that in the bank in his own name.

We have an organ and a banjo and we all dearly love music, but the sweetest songs on earth to me are the old-fashioned songs that father and mother sang long ago, such as "The Old-time Religion"—it can't be beat—and "Home, Sweet Home." That word touches every fiber of the soul and strikes every chord of the human heart with its angelic tone. To the child, home is his world, he knows no other—the father's love, the mother's smile, the sister's embrace and the brother's welcome. Home is the spot where the child pours out his complaints and is the grave of all his sorrows.

To the sister who writes about her little boy refusing to say his prayers I will say that my little boy, when three years old, never failed to say his prayers but after a while he tired of it. Of course I wanted him to keep on but I waited and did not scold and now he always says them. He often says, "Mamma, sing about the prints of the nails in his His hand." Mothers, let's tell them more about Jesus.

If there are any taking COMFORT who knew me as Ada Grinestaff, please let me hear from them through COMFORT. Yours lovingly, MRS. ADA COMBS.

DAHMER, W. VA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

As I have been silent about four years I thought I would come again. I wish to thank all the sisters for the many letters received from them and the communication I was able to establish between the "home folks" and those of the great West.

I do not want to be pessimistic but I wish to express my ideas and then in return get ideas from others. The person who always gets information from others and never gives any in return is selfish, I think.

I was one of eleven children, and we were raised on a little farm so I know that economy was necessary in our home. Now I am the proud mother of four children, Ella Vaiden, eight years; Lucy Verona, five years; Elvira Jane, three years, and Arla Evelyn, sixteen months old. A few years ago I conceived the idea of the savings bank as being a good thing in favor of thrift and a menace against extravagance. I adopted the following plan in our home, as we are located about eight miles from the nearest bank.

1. I provide my children with a suitable place to keep their money—a little bank or purse.
2. I do not permit them to spend their money for trifles.
3. When anything is necessary for the welfare of the children my husband and I buy it out of our savings.
4. When amount is realized sufficient to draw interest, deposit same in bank for them.

We have become a nation of spendthrifts. Twelve millions of our people are in absolute poverty. Many millions more are barely "keeping the wolf from the door." Our children must be taught not only to make money but to save it. Switzerland leads the world in frugality now, and if I am correctly informed, our country ranks as the fifteenth.

With best wishes to Mrs. Wilkinson and all, MRS. ESTELLA DAHMER.

Mrs. Dahmer. Your four rules are admirable, but why not add a fifth one—that of teaching your children, girls and boys, how to spend money. It is a good plan to give the child an allowance and out of this expect him, or her, to buy some of the little things they actually need. The chances are good that the child will be a living example of "a fool and his money" and spend the entire allowance for something foolish and be obliged to get along the rest of the week, or month, on thoughts of what he might have bought had he stopped to consider before making his first purchase. The lesson will seem bitter, to the child, but in the end it invariably teaches them the worth of money.—Ed.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have long been a reader of the sisters' letters though I have never written before. Soon after coming West I subscribed for the paper from the good old "Pine Tree State." I enjoy the whole of the paper and have found many recipes and suggestions that have been a help to me.

THERE is a great howl in this country about free speech. It is the most precious possession we have and is guaranteed by the constitution; but the American people do not believe in free speech, and for that matter scarcely a living soul believes in free speech. When people talk about free speech it just means this and nothing more: They believe that their ideas and their views should be aired from the housetops the world over, but if anyone starts to talk and give vent to ideas that conflict with theirs, they'll throw bricks at his head and shut him up.

There are scores of subjects I would like to discuss in the columns of COMFORT, but if I were to thresh out all the things I am fairly aching to touch upon, I would lose Mr. Gannett half his subscription list in a month. If a man wants to give vent to opinions that conflict with generally accepted ideas about politics, religion and economics, he has to cut loose and start a newspaper of his own, and draw around him those who art in sympathy with those views. There are scores of papers in this country devoted to exploiting this or that particular "ism," and this or that particular brand of religion, and all have their little axes out for the other fellow whose "ism" or religious views differs from theirs. The adherents of these various "isms," clans, bugs and sects, want me to endorse and air their views and knock the stuffing out of all the other fellows. They are all great for free speech, as long as you don't hit any of their pet beliefs. Place however, an impious finger on their idols and they behave like painted savages.

We ought to be able to talk freely about the war in this country, but it can't be done, at least not in a household publication. No one unless he is an ignorant nut who does not know that he is alive, and whose brain has turned to soup is really neutral as far as this war in Europe is concerned. The man who says he doesn't care which side wins writes himself down as a boob and a saphead. No real man ever was or ever can be neutral where right or wrong are in conflict.

There are a lot of people in Europe who don't know what they are fighting for, because they have been content to accept the opinions of others without investigating or have been willfully misinformed and kept in ignorance of the true issues at stake. The masses on both sides fervently believe that their cause is the right one and that the other fellow was the aggressor and not they. That is the tragedy of it all, the inability to get the truth to those who have been willfully deceived, and willfully lied to, so that kings may continue their rule of despotism and poor boobs may shed their blood in order that parasites and loafers may live in idleness. If I were President of this great country I would call a Congress of all the neutral nations, and I would ask the warring nations to send their ablest men to lay before the Congress their side in this great world struggle. I would have a supreme court of nations and I would give every combatant a chance to be heard, a chance to put his cards on the table, and I would let the court decide just who it was that deliberately started this hellish murderfest. The findings of the court should be placed in the hands of every nation, especially the warring nations. The blame should be placed squarely where it belongs and the nation or nations that are at fault should be ostracized, cut off entirely from the family of nations for a certain number of years. You will say it is wrong to punish a whole nation for the sins of its rulers, but as each nation fervently believes that its rulers are in the right, and that the cause of these exploiting parasites is their cause, then they are equally guilty with their rulers, and must be ostracized and punished until they come to their senses. They should be dead to all the rest of the world until they have done penance for their crimes. We punish murderous individuals, we should punish murderous nations. America should be the champion of mankind, the guardian of liberty. President Wilson has voiced some very beautiful sentiments about our duty to mankind, how we should be ever ready to uphold right, righteousness and democracy the world over. All our presidents and presidential candidates, politicians and statesmen get these fine sounding phrases off their chests, especially around election time and the mobs howl with delight, but all this talk is the veriest buncomb. There is not an atom of sincerity at the back of it. Of course our big men would like to do all sorts of fine things, at least a few of them would, but at the best a president has never more than half the nation behind him, and not more than a quarter of that half will be ready to back him up in any worth-while world policy. To become the champions of mankind would mean having one nation with but a single thought, a hundred million people whose hearts throbbed as one, and that kind of nation we haven't got. With a nation of that kind at his back, instead of millions of howling, shrieking, cursing critics, the president could do wonders. But to do anything fine and big we must have people with big, world-wide ideas, and where pray shall we find them?

When the women who toured the country recently on behalf of one of the presidential candidates, got home, they were a much more sober and wiser bunch than when they started. They found even in a great city like Minneapolis, people were almost entirely interested in local politics, and in the majority of places they visited, they said that all the election excitement, or ninety per cent of it, centered around the election of a pound master; some local dough-head whose business it is to gather in stray dogs, hogs and other ferocious wild animals of that type. If our capital were in the middle of the country instead of the edge of it, in Omaha instead of Washington, we might be able to begin to talk nationally, and think nationally instead of to think in terms of hog, and dog pounds. The women said it was practically impossible to find anybody who could think and talk along national lines. Now if you can't talk and think nationally, it is utterly impossible to think and talk internationally, for all internationalism is based on nationalism. The first must precede the second, and if nationalism is not sustained by force of arms if necessary, there can be no internationalism, and without internationalism there can be no world brotherhood, no hope of placing the interests of humanity above the interests of the individual and the state.

So you see our chance of doing something big for our warring brothers and our weaker brothers is mighty small. You can't reason, argue or talk with men whose passions are at the murder point, and neither can you with nations. Some far-seeing men realize this and have started a World League to Enforce Peace. That will mean that every nation that has a grouch against another will have to come into court and air its grouch and grievances before it will be allowed to go and kick the other fellow's lights out, and the League of Peace is determined that any nation that starts fighting contrary to its wishes and mandates will find all the other nations of the world arrayed against it and ready to jump on its back. Uncle Sam ought to be the chief judge in that Supreme Court of Humanity and he ought to have a hundred million people at the back of him ready and willing to do the bidding of that court. This world is still full of inhuman savages, too full of the love of conquest and bloodshed, too full of king, emperor, kaiser, czar and mikado lovers and monarchy idolators, to be swayed in its acts by such altruistic and idealistic institutions as the Hague Peace Tribunal. If that Hague Peace Tribunal had had behind it a league of all the democratic nations of the world, a fighting as well as gab and talk league, the international agreements made by that league would have been kept, and there would have been no war. Andrew Carnegie made one very sensible remark when he said there were certain nations in the world that intended to have peace even if they had to fight for it. Now just as soon as we can get more nations who are ready to fight for peace than are ready to indulge in war for war's sake and the territory that conquest brings, we shall have world peace, and not until then. If there is any benighted idiot, male or female in this wide world who thinks that peace is to be got in any other way, especially by the cowardly process of backing down and eating crow, and pussy footing around, simpering platitudes and turning the other cheek to be smitten, and lifting the other coat tail to be kicked, and bleating like silly geese "I didn't raise my boy to be a soldier" or "my girl to be a mother," or flapping geese wings and chortling "He kept us out of war," and other yawps of pin head, vacuous, craven, impractical, dog pound minds, they are woefully mistaken. This is a world of iron and steel, a world of brute, beast force. It is a world of blood, murder and lawlessness. Look at our own record of nearly a thousand murders a month if you want proof of this. Force controls and the only thing that can dominate force is superior force. We have the material in this country to provide the superior force, but it would need a national spirit, a national organization, military, social, industrial and spiritual, to make that force (righteous in conception, altruistic and idealistic in spirit) conquer all the forces of evil and bring peace to a stricken world. All good men and women who love God and pattern their lives after His Son, the Christ, want peace and brotherhood. But to get these precious things, as the world is constituted today, they must first demonstrate they are ready if need be to fight for them.

Last month we celebrated Washington's birthday. Washington admonished us to observe faith and justice. We should heed his advice and be ready to support with all the strength at our command, the cause of justice the world over, and that would mean we can never be neutral when right and wrong are in conflict. As one writer puts it "justice is not a mere negation, it is a positive, affirmative force and involves active duties as well as passive rights." James M. Beck, one of the greatest publicists of this generation, a man who has written a book which gives the keenest analytical study of the causes of this great war that has yet been published, has recently been on the battle fronts of Europe. In a recent speech he made some statements so forceful, illuminating and interesting that I feel it my duty to bring them to your attention. He says it would serve no useful purpose at this time to analyze the attitude of the different groups of nations toward this country at the present hour. It is enough to say that one group of nations has for his country an intense feeling of resentment and hatred, other groups of nations feel that "with humanity on the cross, America has contented itself like the Roman soldiers with parting the raiment of the crucified.

"The lesser neutral powers have a sense of bitter disillusion and disappointment in the feeling that they look to this greatest of neutral powers for leadership to protect the interests of neutrals and looked in vain. The world is not likely to forget that we of all nations willingly or unwillingly have found enormous prosperity in the misery and suffering of other nations. To every thinking American the possibilities of this situation ought to fill us with apprehension, but our country through its traditions of isolation has been so influenced by the spirit of provincialism (provincial means narrow, local, dog poundy) that only a minority in America pays any attention to the gathering clouds which though they be at the present moment no bigger than a man's hand, may yet one day overcast the heavens. The man who believes that this will be the last war is an incurable optimist. On the contrary it is in my judgment only the beginning of a series of titanic conflicts. Over ravaged fields, newly made graves and desolated homes, the belligerant powers are likely at least for half a century to gaze at each other with irreconcilable hatred. In my judgment therefore, the world is likely to be a seething of international hatred for some decades to come, and it will be difficult and perhaps impossible for the United States to escape in the future from the entanglements of this world crisis. In this portentous period to come America will have need of the wisest and greatest unity of action. * * * * This is the time when America should put aside all minor difficulties and endeavor to act in this world conflict with reasonable unity of action. And yet instead of such unity our country is drifting into a menacing spirit of disunion in the strife between sections and classes."

President Wilson made a statement recently that probably few of you noticed or heeded. He said, and for once he was a true prophet, that this was the last great war in which the United States could remain neutral. That means that when the next great war comes along we shall be in it and if we are in it and don't want to be spanked into a pulp and wiped off the face of the earth, we had better prepare ourselves for the storm and be ready to meet it and repel it. The military forces of the world from now on (and nearly everyone is agreed on this point) will be divided into two great groups, and there is little doubt that circumstances which we shall be powerless to control, will for the sake of our own preservation, ultimately force us into one or other of these groups, for no nation is powerful enough in these days to stand alone.

There are two great ideas fighting for mastery in this world today, the democratic, republican idea, as opposed to the monarchical, autocratic, mediæval idea of government by accidents of birth, otherwise kings, sacreligious fanatics who claim to rule by divine right, and who claim too to be responsible to God alone for their actions. England had a king who made such claims, and the people promptly cut off his head. That was nearly three hundred years ago. Today whatever democracy we enjoy we owe to that act of the British people, under the leadership of the great Commoner, Oliver Cromwell. A hundred years or so later, the French people cut off the head of Louis the Sixteenth, another divine right parasite. That made France a liberty loving, democratic nation forever. Unfortunately other European nations lacked the revolutionary spirit shown by Britain and France, and permitted their arrogant rulers to put the divine right bluff over on them, and they are standing for that kind of rot and dying to maintain that kind of sacreligious piffle at this very moment, hundreds of years after other nations had canned that kind of bunk. And understand this, until all nations the world over can their kings liberty and freedom won't be worth a song unless you are ready to fight for them. If the divinely appointed monarchies win in this world struggle, good by to the United States and all it stands for. If the democratic idea triumphs we can have a Court of Nations and a league to enforce peace. Benjamin Ide Wheeler, one of our most prominent men, writing in the Evening Mail recently said: "The League to Enforce Peace offers so far as I can see the only practical plan for lessening the chances of war in the future. The plan however will be vain even with the support of our national government except as we stand strong enough to command a hearing. The plain straightforward path to follow should be a national plan for universal training. If we are known to have at our command seven or eight million men who have received initial training and know where their places in the ranks are and where there is grease for their gun locks, our opinions and desires regarding peace will have a hearing, otherwise our efforts will be in vain.

The ideas of Mr. Beck and Mr. Wheeler are those that prevail among progressive, far-seeing leaders of thought the country o'er. We must then be ready to support justice, not as an abstract principle, but as an active force the world over. Instead of trying to divide the garment of the crucified we must bind up their wounds. We must bring peace to a warring world, and build up the homes war has shattered, and provide money and material to do the job. That will lessen old world hatred of us and that will give us a chance to try and lessen the deadly hatred that exists between those who have been destroying each other. Then if we gather as many nations as we possibly can around us, as many as are ready and willing to back up with force, if necessary, the League to Enforce Peace the dreadful prospect of future terrible wars will in all probability be happily averted. A course of this kind means life, vitality and honor to this nation. Any other course as Mr. Beck rightly says means spiritual death. To accomplish this does not mean the shedding of blood, but the shedding of narrow, foolish, selfish, childish, craven, provincial, hog pound, dog pound ideas. We must think nationally. We must have a vision, something at present the vast masses of our people have not got; and where there is no vision, the people perish. America must live, it must not perish and you who read this must breathe new life into the "veins of this nation." Consecrate yourselves to your country's service, then war will vanish and world peace will come. Remember, no man can be free in this world and no man has a right to be free until he has fitted himself to fight efficiently for his freedom, and if he fits himself to fight he will never have to fight. Christ is called the Prince of Peace, I prefer to call Him The Prince of Righteousness. A slave can have peace, but only the strong can have justice and righteousness.

Don't forget that Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books may still be had. Start in at once to obtain them,—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort,—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers: the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk stiff covers, either one for a club of four subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues and the best gifts in the world.

My picture book, too, has started a deluge of inquiries: Is Billy the Goat my daughter, is Maria her Ma? Is there an Aunt Charlie? Is the big boy in the picture book my only baby? I have had a little leaflet specially printed answering all these questions fully, and those who are interested will find the same in every copy of the four Uncle Charlie Books sent out this season.

Now for the letters.

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

IT is the wise woman who, when wishing to try out a venture in flower raising confines her efforts to one kind, realizing that anything that is worth while takes plenty of time to perfect. She must, in order to make it a success, study its habit, the special soil it needs, and the right situation, as well as the best kind for profitable flowering. All of this takes time but it saves in the end. It can be done in odd minutes, while attending to household cares. In this way, she keeps herself so well informed that when the season opens she does not have to waste time in useless experiments.

It was a farmer's wife, who succeeded in making a comfortable income by raising sweet peas and this is how she did it. Always fond of outdoor life, and raising flowers she made up her mind that when they moved on to the farm, she would, if possible have a little plot of land that she could call her own. Here she would try out her venture, that is if she could interest her husband to dig up the soil and in odd minutes do the hard work for her.

At the foot of the lane, not far from the kitchen door, was a bit of rocky land, where the sun lay most of the day. It was only ten by fifteen feet but large enough for the first venture. In the late fall, before the hard frost had set in, she had it dug over to a depth of five feet. Over this was spread a thick layer of barnyard manure, although bone meal or sheep manure would have answered the purpose as well.

In order to have early blossoms, in the late winter just before the opening of the spring, she purchased several dozen paper pots. In each one of these she planted some of the seeds, that had been previously soaked to expose embryo. Different varieties were planted, each color by itself, after which the pots were marked in order that they should not be mixed. Any soil she knew was suitable for this growth although a little fertilizer mixed in helps out. They should be set in sunny windows and kept watered, using once a week a diluted liquid manure. It will not be before tiny green shoots will be seen and by the time the ground is ready for planting they will be several inches in height.

The time of planting varies, with the season. An early spring allows it the middle of March. Trenches should be made about six inches apart. They should be dug to a depth of two and a half feet, and two feet in width. A layer of manure should be placed at the bottom, and thoroughly sprayed with the garden hose in order to settle it. The remainder of the depth can be filled in with equal parts of loam, wood earth and old manure, which should be carefully pressed down. It is now ready to be worked on.

Seeds should be very carefully chosen, purchased from some reliable firm, and for the best results they should not be carried over from season to season. In order to save confusion, and mixing of colors, each one of the trenches should be planted with one variety only.

The seeds should be soaked, or they may need chipping, more especially the darker colored flowers which have extremely thick shells. Furrows, six inches deep, should be made, all along the row, into each one four or five seeds should be planted and covered with two inches of soil. This should be pressed firmly down using for this purpose a two-inch strip of board fastened into a handle. Fine lime should then be sprinkled over the surface, this is a preventive from cutworms which are the sweet peas' worst enemies.

Along each row, plant strong posts ten feet apart, and fasten to them a five foot wire netting. Many people use brush, and string, but it is not as good or as serviceable, for the brush gets torn up and the string rots and becomes broken, requiring constant mending. Then, too, posts may be a little more expensive but when once firmly planted, more especially if they are cedar posts, will last for years.

A separate bed adjoining the main bed was dug over for the paper pots. It was much smaller, being only six feet long and four in width. The manner of planting was much the same as that of the seed—and they can, if you like, be set out at intervals from the middle of March until the first of May, so that there will be a succession of bloom before the main bed has commenced to flower. The plants should be set out five or six inches apart as space counts for strong growth. The value of paper pots is shown, in the fact that they do not have to be disturbed. The exterior melting away giving the plant more chance to come in contact with the soil.

When the plants are once up, they require very little care, except an occasional stirring of the soil so that it shall not become caked around them, and they should be abundantly watered twice every week, every other time with liquid manure. If the plants do not become as vigorous as one wishes, a small quantity of nitrate of soda should be dug in on either side of the trench six inches away from the vine and great care should be taken that it does not touch them.

The enemies which one has to combat in the growing of sweet peas are aphids and mildew. As the remedy for the former use tobacco emulsion, and for the latter, a dusting of soot before flowering and once a month afterwards. They are easy to grow, take little time and care, and provide a wealth and variety of fragrant blossoms all summer long.

If you wish more vigorous plants when they are about three inches high, the tops should be pinched, put in order to have the lateral growth stronger, and if extra large flowers are desired, an additional watering with liquid manure should be given. This is made by dissolving sheep or cow manure with water.

The sweet pea is as a German doctor writes, "A thankful flower," and is thankful for even a slight attention. They should never be allowed to go to seed, and to keep it at its best the vine should be thoroughly gone over every morning, for in this way only can they be made to blossom continuously for months. The neglect of this duty brings about less bloom, and unhealthy plants.

If you wish to be successful, the flowers should be taken into the house and placed in water in a cool, dark room. If they are sold when they are picked they soon wither, the long stems absorb the water, and keep the blossom fresh and strong for a very much longer time than if they had been picked and sent away at once.

If they are to be sent any distance they should be treated in this manner, after which they are packed in damp cotton-wool, covered with waxed paper, and put in a box for transportation. Careful attention to these facts never fails to insure their reaching the customer in as perfect a condition as they were when first bought. Treated in this way they are able to be sent long distances, reaching their destination safely.

Twelve years ago, little was thought of this particular flower. It was considered stiff and inconspicuous. Through careful experiments in developing types to get color variation, they are now "gorgeous," and the color scheme runs through most of the tints of the rainbow. They show a wonderful diversity with the possible exception of deep scarlet, yellows, and pure blues.

A great development in sweet peas have been made possible by cross fertilization. This is especially manifested in the Spencer or Giant Orchid flowering species. The blooms of this type often measuring two inches across, showing huge standards and very large wings, twice the size of the old kind variety. This particular sweet pea comes in many varieties, ranging from white down through orange, scarlet and salmon to blue, purple and maroon. They come in packages varying in cost from five to twenty cents, but are cheaper if bought by the quarter of pound.

For commercial purposes they are very valuable as they are profuse bloomers, and shy seeders, both of which facts are important to flower raisers.

Many of the old varieties cannot be improved upon. The amateur grower, realizes the importance of his previous study when he picks up the catalogues and is not confused by the terms "Grandiflora," "Unwin," etc. He has learned what these mean, and whether they are suitable for his purpose or not.

Every grower has to learn from experience as to what kind he prefers, but for white there is nothing better than the King White, the Dorothy Eckford and Nora Unwin. For blue, Flora Norton, and Captain of the Blues; for lavender, After Glow, Lady Grisell Hamilton and Frank Dolby. For cream pink, Dobby's Cream and Mrs. Hugh Dixon. For striped and flaked red, use the American Spencer. In addition to these the Dorothy Tenant, the Blanche Ferry, and the Royal Rose are good blossomers, and stand the test, as well as some of the newer varieties.

Some colors are better sellers than others. White is much called for for funerals, as well as lavender. For weddings, pink, and pink and white are the most fashionable, while for birthday parties, pink are most frequently desired.

These rules were carefully carried out by the farmer's wife with such success, that today she is planting a quarter of an acre. The first year of her venture, she cleared only fifty dollars; last year, she had become so well known, through ten years' experience, she cleared over five hundred dollars. The only requisite for making an equally successful venture would have to be knowledge of market, no lowering of standard, and eternal vigilance.

The Masked Bridal

at once to her side, a spasm of agony convulsed her beautiful features.

"Oh, Mrs. Weld!" she moaned.

"Hush, child!" said the woman, bending over her and laying a gentle hand upon her head: "It will all come right, so just shut your eyes and try to go to sleep. I am going to stay with you tonight, and nobody else shall come near you. Don't talk before the servants," she added, in a swift whisper close to her ear.

An expression of intense relief swept over the fair sufferer's face at this friendly assurance, and lifting a grateful look to the housekeeper's face, she settled herself contentedly upon her pillow.

Dr. Arthur then drew Mrs. Weld to the opposite side of the room, where he gave her directions for the night and what to do in case the fainting should return—which, however, he said he did not anticipate, as the action of the heart had become normal and the circulation more natural.

A little later he took his leave, after which the housemaids were dismissed and Edith was alone with her friend.

When the door closed after them the girl stretched forth her hands in a gesture of helpless appeal to the woman.

"Oh, Mrs. Weld," she wailed, "must I be bound to that wretch during the remainder of my life? I cannot live and bear such a fate! Oh, what a shameful mockery it was! I felt, all the time, as if I were committing a sacrilege, and yet I never dreamed that I was being used so treacherously——"

The housekeeper sat down beside the excited girl, whose eyes were burning with a feverish light, and who showed symptoms of returning hysteria.

She removed her spectacles, and taking both of those trembling hands in hers, looked steadily into the troubled eyes.

"My child," she said, in a gentle, soothing tone, "you must not talk about it tonight—you must not even think about it. I have told you that it will all come out right; no man could hold you to such a marriage—no court would hold you bound when once it is understood how fraudulently you had been drawn into it."

"But who is going to be able to prove that it was fraudulent?" questioned Edith with increasing anxiety. "Apparently I went to the altar with that man of my own free will; with all the semblance of sincerity I took those marriage vows upon me and then received the congratulations of all those guests as if I were a real wife. Oh, it was terrible! terrible! terrible!" and her voice arose almost to a shriek of agony as she concluded.

"Hush! not another word! Edith look at me!" commanded Mrs. Weld with gentle but impressive authority.

The young girl, awed to silence in spite of her grief and nervous excitement, looked wonderingly up to into those magnetic eyes which almost seemed to betray a dual nature.

"Oh, dear Mrs. Weld, you do not seem at all like yourself," she gasped. "What—who are you?"

"I am your friend, my dear," was the soothing response, "and I am going to prove it, first by forbidding you to refer to this subject again until after you have had a nice, long sleep. Trust me and obey me, dear; I am going to stand by you as long as you need a friend, and I promise you that you shall never be a slave to the man who has so wronged you tonight. Now put it all out of your mind. I do not want to give you an opiate if I can avoid it, for you would not be so well tomorrow after taking it; but I shall have to if you keep up this excitement."

She continued to hold the girl's trembling hands in a strong, protecting clasp, while she still gazed steadily into her eyes, until, as if overcome by a will stronger than her own—her physical strength being well-nigh exhausted—the white lids gradually drooped, the rigid form relaxed, the lines smoothed themselves out of her brow, and she was soon sleeping quietly and restfully.

When her regular breathing assured the watcher beside her that oblivion had sealed her senses for the time, she bent over her, touched her lips softly to her forehead, and murmured:

"Dear heart, they shall never hold you to that wicked ceremony—to that unholy bond! If the law will not cancel it, if they have sprung the trap upon you so cunningly that the court cannot free you, they shall at least leave you in peace and virtually free, and you shall never want for a friend as long as—as—Gertrude Weld lives," she concluded, a peculiar smile wreathing her lips.

While this strange woman sat in that third-story room and watched her sleeping patient, the hours sped by on rapid wings to the merry dancers below, very few of whom concerned themselves about, or even knew of, the tragic ending of the marriage which they had witnessed earlier in the evening.

But oh, how heavily these hours dragged to one among that smiling throng!

Anna Goddard could scarcely control her impatience for her guests to be gone—for the terrible farce to end.

When she saw signs of the ball breaking up she sent an imperative message to her husband to join her, for she knew that it would cause unpleasant remarks if the master of the house should fail to put in an appearance to "speed the parting guest."

But she almost wished, when he came to her side, that she had not sent for him, for he seemed like one who had lost his hold upon every hope in the world, and looked so coldly upon her that she would rather have had him plunge a dagger into her heart.

But the weary evening was over at length—the last guest from outside was gone—the last visitor in the house had retired.

Her husband also had watched his opportunity when she was looking another way, and had slipped out of the room and up-stairs to escape having any complaints or questions from her.

And so Anna Goddard stood alone in her elegant drawing-room, a most miserable woman, in spite of the luxury that surrounded her.

Finally, with a weary sigh, the unhappy woman went slowly up-stairs, feeling as if, in spite of the smiles and compliments which she had that evening received, she had not a real friend in the world.

Going to her dressing-case, she began to remove her jewels.

The house was very still—so still that it almost seemed deserted, and this feeling only served to add to the sense of loneliness and desolation that was oppressing her.

Her face was full of pain, her beautiful lips quivered with suppressed emotion as she gathered up her costly treasures in both hands and stood looking at them a moment, thinking bitterly how much money they represented, and yet of how little real value they were to her as an essential element in her life.

She moved toward her casket to put her gems carefully away.

She stood looking down into the box for a minute, then, as if impelled by some irresistible impulse, she laid the priceless stones all in a heap upon the table, when, taking hold of a loop, which had escaped the housekeeper's notice, she lifted the cushion from its place, thus revealing the papers which had been concealed beneath it.

She seized the uppermost one with an eager hand.

"I believe I will destroy it," she mused, "I am afraid there is something more in his desire to possess it than he is willing to admit, for he is so determined to get possession of it."

She half unfolded the document as if to examine it, when a sudden shock went quivering through her frame and a look of amazement over spread her face.

"What can this mean?" she exclaimed, in a tone of alarm, as she dashed it upon the floor and seized another.

This also proved disappointing.

"It was here the last time I looked! I am sure I left it on top of the others!" she muttered, with white lips, as, with trembling hands and heaving bosom, she overturned everything in search of the missing document.

But the most rigid examination failed to reveal it, and, with a cry of mingled agony and anger, she sank weak and trembling upon the nearest chair.

"It is gone!" she whispered, hoarsely; "some one has stolen it!"

She sat there looking utterly helpless and wretched for a few moments.

Then her eyes began to blaze and her lips to twitch spasmodically.

"He has done this!" she cried, starting to her feet once more. "That was why he was absent so long from the ballroom tonight."

Seizing the papers she had removed from the box, she hastily replaced them, also the cushion, restoring the jewels to their places, after which she shut and locked the casket, taking care to remove the key from its lock.

This done, she hurried from the room, looking more like a beautiful fiend than a woman.

CHAPTER XVII.

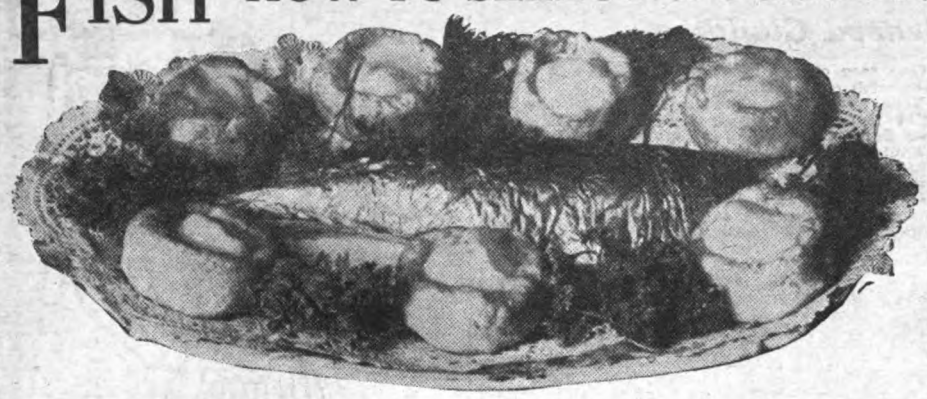
"WOULD YOU DARE BE FALSE TO ME, AFTER ALL THESE YEARS?"

With her exquisite robe trailing unheeded after her, Anna Goddard swept swiftly down the hall and rapped imperatively upon the door of her husband's room.

There was no answer from within.

She tried the handle. The door would not yield—it was locked on the inside.

"Gerald, are you in bed?" his wife inquired, putting her lips to the crack and speaking low.



"What do you wish, Anna?" the man questioned.

"I wish to see you—I must speak with you, even if you have retired," she returned, imperatively.

There was a slight movement within the room, then the door was thrown open, and Gerald God-

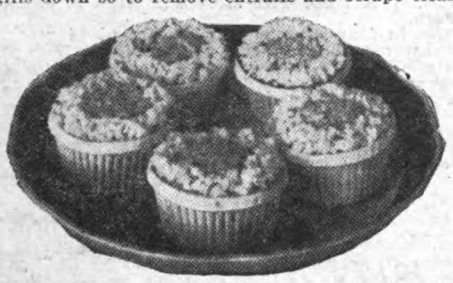
FISH—HOW TO SELECT & COOK IT

BAKED SALMON WITH POTATO CASES

By Ella Gordon

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.



FISH is becoming more and more a valued article of diet, its digestibility more appreciated. The price of meat has advanced till the sensible housewife looks about for a partial substitute and finds it in fish. Its large proportion of nitrogenous material makes it an especially valuable food for those upon whom there are great demands for nervous energy.

Fat fish such as halibut, mackerel, salmon, shad, etc., head the list in nourishment, and should be cooked by baking or broiling.

Small fish such as caught in fresh waters, and the lean of white fish are suitable for frying because they are not oily. Fish should be salted with great care, as the nourishing part is greatly reduced by improper salting.

Fish requires to be eaten when strictly fresh to make a perfect food. Direct contact with ice draws out the juices, therefore fish should be laid in a pan if it is to go on the ice. Dull, sunken eyes indicate that the fish has been kept too long. When washing fish, do it quickly in salted water, not letting it stand wet, but dry with a cloth. The odor is one of the best tests of freshness of fish.

When baking a fish whole, do not remove head and tail, but clean and leave on. Split from the gills down so to remove entrails and scrape clean.

SCALLOPED FISH.

When preparing whole fish to broil, split down the back, clean, wash and wipe dry.

Fillets of fish are thick pieces free from bone.

Fish forcemeat is fish finely chopped and pressed through a fine wire sieve before being cooked.

To boil fish, wrap in cheese-cloth, cover with boiling water, and when the fish begins to boil, set it back where it will just simmer. Cook four pounds about thirty minutes.

Steaming is far better than boiling fish as none of the juices are lost. It takes a little longer to steam fish than to boil.

To broil, wash and wipe, lay on well-greased broiler and turn every five minutes over a clear fire. Do not hold too near heat as the oils catch fire and the fish will not cook evenly. Salt and spread well with softened butter.

To fry fish, wash and wipe very dry. Dip in beaten egg seasoned with salt and pepper; then roll in flour, meal or bread crumbs. Use deep fat very hot, as the fish cools the fat rapidly.

Eat bread and potatoes with fish, and use plenty of butter with the kinds of fish that lack fat. Lemon juice makes a wholesome condiment, and is especially desirable with oysters, clams and lobster.

Baked Salmon with Potato Cases

First read above directions for baking. Clean fish by lightly washing in cold water and wipe dry. Stuff and sew together. Cut gashes three inches apart on both sides and insert strips of salt pork. Rub with cream and salt. Dredge with flour and bake in a hot oven without water. When the flour begins to brown, baste frequently. Remove to a hot platter and surround with potato cases filled with drawn butter sauce flavored with lemon.

SALT CODFISH BALLS.

STUFFING.—To one cup of cracker crumbs, add salt and pepper, a teaspoon of scraped onion, chopped parsley, two teaspoons of chopped sour pickle, four tablespoons of melted butter and one beaten egg.

POTATO CASES.—Pare white potatoes and boil in salted water and drain. Dry by shaking around in kettle on hot part of stove. Put potatoes through masher and season with salt, pepper, butter and enough hot milk or cream so the potato can be handled. To every three cupfuls, add two eggs, yolks and whites beaten separately, when potato is partly cooled. Add the yolks first then beat in the whites. Shape first into balls, then flatten top and bottom and scoop out the centers to hold sauce. Put on a pan in a hot oven and bake a golden brown. Fill with sauce just before serving.

DRAWN BUTTER SAUCE.—Melt four tablespoons of butter in a sauce pan and add two tablespoons of dry flour. Stir till smooth and hot, then add two cups of boiling water very gradually, stirring all the time. Cook ten minutes slowly, then add as much more butter, salt and pepper and remove from fire. Garnish with parsley.

Baked Finnan-Haddie

Wash and cover with cold water, letting it stand fifteen minutes flesh side down. Rinse. Put in baking pan (agate preferable), cover with rich milk and bake fifteen to twenty-five minutes, depending on thickness. As the fish takes up the milk, baste occasionally to prevent drying. When done, remove the bone and skin and fold once and lay on platter. Add to the milk in pan enough more to make sufficient gravy. Season with salt and thicken with flour first mixed with a little cold water. Cook five minutes, add butter and pour over fish. Garnish with slices of hard-boiled egg. Any kind of smoked fish can be cooked this way.

Salt Codfish Balls

Shred one cup of raw salt codfish and put in a sauce pan with three cups of raw potato cut in half inch squares. Just cover with boiling water. Stew slowly till potato is tender but not mushy. Drain thoroughly and mash with a fork. Add salt and pepper and two tablespoons of butter and beat with fork till light, and lastly add one well-beaten egg and beat again. Shape in balls and fry in deep fat till brown. Garnish with lettuce leaves.

Scalloped Fish

An appetizing way to use left-overs of fish. Shred cold fish; have ready buttered bread crumbs and white sauce and fill shallow cups in alternate layers; first the fish, then sauce and crumbs. Garnish with parsley.

WHITE SAUCE.—Melt three tablespoons of butter but do not brown, and stir in three tablespoons of dry flour making a smooth paste. Add salt and cayenne pepper and one and one half cups of hot milk. Cook eight minutes slowly, stirring constantly.

Sardines with Rice Cakes

Hard boil six eggs and with a fork mash the yolks. Bone one and one half the amount of sardines and mix with egg yolks. Finely chop the egg whites, add four tablespoons of chopped pickles, two tablespoons of lemon juice, one tablespoon of table sauce, pepper and salt. With a fork toss all together till thoroughly mixed with the sardines and yolks. Heap in the center of serving plate and surround with hot rice cakes.

RICE CAKES.—Two cups of boiled rice salted. Add the well-beaten yolks of two eggs and then the well-beaten whites and beat together. Drop on well-greased biscuit tin and bake till brown in a hot oven.

Potted Fish

Eight medium-sized herring or mackerel skinned and split in halves. Mix tgether a scant half cup of salt, less than one eighth of a teaspoon of cayenne pepper and half a cup of whole spices. In a small stone jar put a layer of fish, then a layer of salt and spices, and repeat till all is used. Cover with moderately strong vinegar. Bake so none of the liquid will evaporate, and the best way is to tie over the top a thick cloth and cover that with bread dough. Bake five hours in moderate oven. This keeps a long time and is a delicious relish.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

I left Maine, my home state, in November, 1915, and came directly to California, attending the Exposition the last seven days and wishing I had seven weeks to attend. I enjoyed every minute of it, and especially the California and Canadian exhibits as I am country born and bred and am interested in everything that goes with farming.

Though I have been in California over a year I have spent all the time in the city, but hope to go to the country soon and I would like to hear from sisters living in the country, on ranches, or in small towns of California, Nevada, Arizona, Texas or New Mexico; or in fact, anywhere in the Western or Southwestern part of the United States. Particularly would I like to hear from sisters who, like myself, are lovers of country life and animals, especially horses. So sisters and cousins, please write.

As so many of the sisters give descriptions of themselves, I will too. I am five feet four inches tall and weigh one hundred and twenty pounds; medium brown hair, gray eyes; age, too old to tell, but less than thirty.

I enjoy the discussions on Woman Suffrage and though I, myself, have never voted, I believe women should have the right. Why not? Many women own property and they have to pay taxes, so why shouldn't they vote?

Although California is very different from my home state, I like out here and hope to see much more of the West and Southwest. I am a working girl so cannot travel only as I work and earn enough to go from place to place.

I would like to hear from sisters living near the groves of "Big Trees" of California or in mining sections of the West.

This Christmas was not very real to me, as it was so different from Christmas weather in Maine. We had a little white frost and the Californians thought it terribly cold.

At this writing I am in Los Angeles but expect soon to be at the address given below, and if not, the letters the sisters write will be forwarded to me. Address,

MISS NELLIE GOODELL, El Centro, R. R. 1, Cal.

LANSING, N. C.

DEAR COMFORT FRIENDS:

Here comes your noisy little Tar Heel friend with some more of her nonsense. May I come in? I'll promise not to mention Paul, Peter or Politics and be just as good as I can. I'll tell you sisters something if you won't use it for a wet blanket, 'cause it's against the "Cheerful Law" to give wet blankets. Honor bright, you won't? Well, I've had to have my leg amputated! There—some of the sympathetic sisters have forgotten already and are coming with long faces and words of pity two miles long. Pray spare both and substitute encouragement, if you please.

I was taken sick July 25, 1916, and suffered more than anyone can ever realize, without actual experience, for three months. Papa planned all along to carry me to the hospital when I should be strong enough but each day left me worse till at last we all realized that we must face the inevitable and I, at least, faced it cheerfully. There was nothing left to do but to submit to the operation and now I am well and strong and can use an artificial leg in about two months, then I'll be 'most as good as new, won't I? We know not how to appreciate this life with its beauties and pleasures until we have been denied them a while. Then, and only then, can we realize that life is too short to spend in grumbling, rebellion and unthankfulness. I'm afraid my misfortune hasn't cured me of a cheerful disposition. I'm wondering if it will ever be cured in me. Mamma says not. Surely if I can go through life on one leg and wear a smile that comes from the heart, the world can wear one for me.

Since writing to dear old COMFORT I've been deluged with letters from nearly every state in the union. Some were cheerfully written and some were not but on the whole I think they are a pretty good bunch of hopefulness and if I've failed to answer any, please inform me. I tried to answer all but may have made a mistake and left one out. I received a nice letter from a boy in jail. Did I answer? Indeed I did, and I'm not ashamed of it, either. If ever anyone needs encouragement and confidence it is the boy or girl who is going wrong. Suppose that was your boy, mothers? How would you feel to know that he was behind the prison bars, shut out from the world, deserted by friends (?) and with never a kind word or smile of encouragement to tell him that even if he had wandered from the paths of virtue and righteousness, while there's life there's hope. He is some mother's boy and her heart may be aching for him as your heart would ache for your boy. He may be guilty—I can't say that he isn't—but once he was innocent and pure, and if God in His mercy can forgive the deepest sinner, however low he may have sunk into perdition, what are we to judge a fellow being? I fear we all judge wrongly and too often. We are all just human and there's too much bad in the best of us.

When a friend is in trouble and disgrace, let's lend a helping hand and let him know that someone cares whether he makes good or not. There are none of us immune from the hand of fate and who knows but what, some day, we may need a little encouragement and the aid of a friendly push, but, alas, the push is too often in the downward direction. "Pride goeth before destruction and a haughty spirit before a fall."

Here is a little poem (no author's name was given) that I clipped from a magazine and it rings so true:

"Who gives this world a noble thought,
And writes it out in prose or hymn,
May furnish for some lowly soul
A stepping stone on which to climb.
For I believe each child of earth,
However darkly stained by sin,
Still holds the hope that higher worth,
Somehow, somewhere, he yet may win.
Then send abroad your noblest thoughts,
Nor idly wait some higher call,
Give to humanity and God your best,
Nor deem that gift too small."

Dear Mrs. Wilkinson, of course you may visit me in my dream ranch when it gets to be a reality. I am none the less determined to be a stock raiser, but papa doesn't want me to give up a literary education now so I suppose "my ranch" will have to wait a

Home Dressmaking & Fashion Forecasts for Spring

Fashion Hints by Geneva Gladding

MIDDY blouses have lost none of their popularity, and are shown in every material from cotton to silk and satin.

Coat dresses and one-piece frocks are nice for growing girls as well as for their elder sisters, and surely there is no style more youthful and becoming especially for slender figures.

Even at this early date the shops are beginning to show spring fabrics, and the wise woman will soon be busy with her cotton frocks.

For sport wear there is a new cotton gabardine that promises to wear and wash well. It comes in a variety of colorings and patterns, and is especially nice for separate skirts.

Some changes are announced for the new sweaters.

We will have odd stripe and check combinations and zigzag stripes.

The old style sweater to be slipped over the head will be most fashionable.

The new sport coats will be cut extremely full. Some lovely models are made of shantung, trimmed with silk jersey. There will also be many leather trimmed garments.

One sees coats and dresses with loose panels lined with contrasting material.

Yoke effects are shown on many of the new waist models. Surplice styles so becoming to most figures are good for separate waists.

Tunic skirts are in good style and are well adapted for the remodeling of a last season's gown.

One could have a pretty blouse of lawn with trimming bands and peplum of a contrasting color, and a new two-piece skirt of cheviot for general wear.

For a dainty afternoon dress, the one-piece models in simple styles are best, both as to grace and finish as well as because the simple frocks are easily made.

There are lovely new silk sport blouses, in long tunic style and smart shirt-waists with attractive decorative as well as useful pockets.

On spring coats one may find collars so arranged that they may be rolled high or low to suit one's taste.

Dark blue seems to be the most popular color and gray and beige are in good style.

Georgette crepe, chiffon cloth and marquisette are nice for daytime dresses.

Summer, Showing Advance Styles

EVERY woman knows how to appreciate a comfortable protective apron, and especially if it is a model that is easy to develop and easy to adjust. At this season of the year one may readily find in the shops lengths of gingham and percale that will be fine for aprons and house dresses.

The home dressmaker will also turn her thoughts to spring dresses for the children, which are always more satisfactory when made at home, for one can have a choice of style and better material.

It is now that the stores are showing "white sales" in undergarments, and while there is much about ready-made underwear that is pleasing and attractive, these things can be made at home at one half the cost and with more individuality and beauty.

Pink seems to be a favorite color for lingerie, and when embroidered in white or self color is very pretty.

Questions Answered

F. F. L., Kansas.—To cover a mould, cut a circle of material a bit more than three eighths inch larger all around than the outline of the mould. Push a little bit of surgeon's cotton through the hole in the center of the mould and stretch it evenly over the face of the mould. Gather at least one eighth inch from the edge on the circle of material, place over the mould and draw up the thread. Be sure to keep the thread at an even distance from the edge of the mould and with the gathers even, the finished edges will be smooth. Sew back and forth across underside of the button to strengthen it and then it is ready for sewing on.

AMATEUR DRESSMAKER, Indiana.—Perhaps this is what you wanted to know, anyway, I hope it will help you, and others.

A.—Pipings are made by cutting material one and one half inch wide, and folding it lengthwise, then basting to secure the edges. Folds are made by cutting bias bands and basting them together so one side will be longer by one quarter inch than the other. The longer side is then turned down over the skirt, and the fold is basted and then stitched to the garment. As this style of trimming will not launder well, it is not wise to use it on wash materials. A flat fold is made by cutting material of any desired width, basting the material down one quarter inch on each side and sewing it to the garment. In turning folds and hems always use a marker. Trimmings of cording in fancy shapings may be made of silk or other material, by overcasting bias strips of material over a cord of any desired size. Shirred bands are made by sewing a small cord into either side of a bias band that has been turned in on both sides. Some artistic forms may be made by drawing up the cords that are run through these bands. Decorative motifs may be made with the simple Fagot stitch. Baste bias bands of material or narrow ribbon over any design on paper or muslin, join the bands with the stitching, and clip the bastings to remove from the paper or muslin. To cut a true bias band or fold, fold your material on a true bias, that is cornerwise, so that the selvage falls on a line even with the cut edges. The fold is the bias, cut through the fold, and measure the stripes desired, so as to have them of even width. It is well to mark the width with chalk or pencil every few inches, and then rule a line to connect the markings. Now join the ends of the material together, so that the ruled lines meet. Press the seam open, and then begin to cut on the ruled lines, round and round. You will have a long bias strip. Straps may be made in the same way.

Garden Time Again

WITH the approach of spring we begin to make our garden plans. The first thing in line is the hotbed, a feature of early gardening too often neglected. Every one in the North who has land enough to grow a good-sized garden should have a hotbed.

The hotbed should be placed on the south side of a building or on a sheltered slope with a southern exposure. The land beneath it should be well drained. It may be built upon the top of the ground or a pit may be dug in the earth for the manure and a frame built over the pit.

How to Make the Hotbed

As soon as a location has been selected the manure should be made ready. Fresh horse manure should be used. If the pit has not been dug in the fall the manure should be piled up on the spot where the hotbed is to stand. The heating of the manure will help to draw out what frost remains in the ground. If the manure is dry water should be added. As soon as the manure begins to heat it should be forked over. This should be done every few days for three weeks, being careful each time to see that the manure is thoroughly mixed and uniformly treated.

When it has gotten to steaming well it should be pushed back the width of the pile and a foot of earth removed from the spot on which the pile stood. This will form the pit. A box two feet deep, made of boards nailed to stakes driven into the ground, should be built around this pit and the steaming manure shoveled in and tramped down solidly. When finished the manure should be two feet deep. On top of this at least four inches of the top soil taken from the pit should be placed. The remainder of the soil should be banked up around the outside of the bed.

The bed should be made any desired length and of a width to fit the sash to be used. Old windows answer well for this purpose. If the frame is built three feet wide a muslin cover may be used instead of glass though the latter is to be preferred. The frame should be higher in the rear than at the front, so that the glass covers will slope toward the south.

Planting the Hotbed

The seeds should not be sown in the bed until the violent heat which follows placing the manure in the bed has subsided. It is usually safe to let the bed stand a week before planting. It therefore takes about a month from the time that the hotbed is begun until the seeds are placed in the soil.

Many people fail with hotbeds because they do not take proper care of the plants. On cold nights the heat should be saved by covering the sash with blankets or gunny sacks. On warm days the sash should be raised or taken off entirely to let out the surplus heat. A constant effort must be made to keep the temperature as nearly uniform as possible.

Hotbed plants should be watered heavily but not too frequently. This is best done on the mornings of bright days so that the plants themselves will be dry when they go to bed at night.

Hotbed plants need thinning, weeding and cultivating in exactly the same way as those grown in the open ground.

Study Your Garden

The garden spot should be selected with special care. No rules can be given that apply to all needs. However, no one wants a wet or poorly drained garden. Stiff, sticky clays are poor garden lands. A north slope is undesirable. A light, rich, well-drained sandy soil with a southern or southeastern slope will come as near supplying ideal garden conditions as any, however. On limited areas, in villages and towns or even on farms, some portions of the garden may be shaded by buildings or trees. It is important to know what plants do best in the open and what ones succeed in the shade.

WHAT TO PLANT IN THE OPEN.—Plants whose success depends upon leaf growth must be grown in the open. Tomatoes, peppers, egg plants, melons, cucumbers and squashes must be grown in the open. Their fruit is produced rapidly and hence must have an abundance of leaf growth to manufacture the food that is stored in the fruit. On the other hand, slow maturing plants often do better in the shade.

WHAT TO PLANT IN THE SHADE.—Cabbage and lettuce will stand a little shade. Peas do best in it. A good rule to remember when deciding what to plant in the shade, is this: Plant in the shade those plants which when grown under natural conditions shade themselves. The big leaves of cabbage and lettuce and the vines of peas all tend to shade each other, hence will do well if planted in the shade. It is well to remember, however, that such plants cannot be planted so thickly in the shade or too much light will be cut off.

Have You Ordered Your Garden Seeds?

Remember what we have said through these columns about ordering garden seeds early from reliable seedsmen. Don't wait until the last minute and don't buy seeds of doubtful origin or old seeds that may have been kept over from last year or even before that time. Be sure to get fresh seeds that will grow at first planting if you want a good garden. Get your seeds early and test samples of them in the house before planting. You can't plant over and expect results. Many folks blame the weather when they have to plant over. In nine cases out of ten, however, the fault is not with the weather but with the seeds.

Try Out Something New This Spring

Have you ever tried endive or egg plant or mango peppers or peanuts or chewfles or collards or swiss chard or everbearing strawberries or any one of half a hundred other things we might mention? If not, try one or two new plants this year. You may like them.

Making the Home Beautiful

Are you going to "fix up" around the house a little this spring? If so, here are a few suggestions which you may find helpful.

BABBERRY FOR HEDGES.—For hedges there is nothing better than barberry, of which there are three principal varieties,—the common, the purple leaf and Thumberg's. The latter is the most beautiful and bears numerous red berries which stay on the bushes all winter.

SPIREA FOR CLUSTERS.—Spirea, or bridal wreath as it is often called, is one of the best shrubs to use in clusters for filling in corners or concealing unsightly places. There are several varieties of this plant of which the Van Houten is the most beautiful.

CLEMATIS OR WISTARIA FOR TRELLISES.—The wistaria is a beautiful climbing vine bearing great clusters of purple or white flowers. It is hardy anywhere. The Japanese clematis is a most beautiful vine as is also the purple variety. Both are particularly well adapted to screens and trellises.

A FEW OTHER SUGGESTIONS.—Beautful, hardy shrubs are the red flowering almond, the variegated althea, the pink duetzia, the golden forsythia and the tamarix. Unusual and attractive vines are the matrimony vine and the perennial sweet pea. Pompon dahlias, panama lilies, greenback cannas, plutarch peonies and eldora iris are new, unusual and attractive flowers. They bear close acquaintance.

Now is the Time to Prune

Have you pruned your fruit trees and your shrubbery yet? Or did you do it last fall? If not, now is the time to prune before the buds start.

Many people think pruning every four or five years is all that their orchard needs. This is a great mistake. Orchard trees as well as small fruits need pruning every year. It takes less time and gets better results, besides small fruits must have the old canes removed.

HOW TO REMOVE BIG LIMBS.—To remove a big limb that is giving a poor shape to the tree or that has grown so large that there is danger of splitting down, make three cuts as follows: First saw about half way through the limb from the under side about a foot from the tree (or until the saw begins to "pinch"). Then cut down from the top a few inches farther away from the tree. The under side cut will prevent the limb from splitting down and injuring the tree. This will leave a stub about a foot long which can be removed by cutting close to the tree.

TREATING THE WOUNDS.—After the limb has been removed the edges of the wound should be smoothed with a sharp knife so that the bark will readily grow over the wound. All wounds of one inch or more in diameter should be painted over with white lead or asphaltum. This prevents the entrance of molds and bacteria which cause decay.

LET IN THE SUNLIGHT.—Everybody has noticed that the nicest apples usually grow on the topmost branches. This is because they get more sunlight and the free circulation of air prevents the growth of injurious pests. In pruning it is well to remember this fact and open up the head of the tree so that sunlight and air can get in. This is sure to result in a better quality of fruit.

CUT OUT SMALL BRANCHES.—The tree always produces more branches than it can use in the production of high class fruit. These unnecessary branches should be cut away when they are small. A sharp knife is best to use on those that can be easily reached. For those out of reach pruning shears attached to a pole should be used. Always cut as close to the tree or limb as possible and be sure to make a smooth cut.

PRUNING SMALL FRUITS.—The rule is to prune liberally. A few strong canes or bushes produce more and better fruit than many crowded and inferior ones. As soon as a cane has borne fruit cut it away and give the new ones a chance. In raspberries and blackberries the old canes die anyway and must be removed, but with currants and gooseberries one should use his judgment and preserve only the best of the old canes. In these the young shoots do not produce fruit the first year. One can always tell the fruit producing canes by looking for the little "fruit spurs" that shoot out from the branch. Young canes are smooth and bear no fruit spurs. Old ones may produce a lot of spurs but very poor fruit.

PRUNING ORNAMENTAL SHRUBBERY.—Most people are afraid to prune ornamental shrubbery as much as it needs. Liberal pruning produces thick, dense heads which in most shrubs is the effect desired. One scarcely ever makes the mistake of "cutting back" too much. Use the knife and cut out all old canes. They are only in the way. If pruning has been long neglected it is often better to cut clear back to the ground and let an entirely new growth spring up from the roots. This does not set the shrubbery back so much as one would at first think. The strong root system and the abundance of food material forces rapid growth of the new shoots and after the first year only an expert would notice that the shrubs had been cut back at all. The new heads may then be controlled by pruning to suit.

DON'T FORGET CULTIVATION, HOWEVER.—Cultivation is as necessary to the success of small shrubs as it is to the growth of corn. After every spring pruning dig up around the roots to let the air in. Apply well rotted barnyard manure and work thoroughly into the soil. This will force the new growth. The heavier the pruning the more the necessity for careful cultivation and a liberal supply of manure.

Starting with Sheep

With wool selling for thirty cents a pound and up the past season it is little wonder that farmers are talking of going into the sheep business the coming season and many of them are going to be disappointed if they do. Not every man is cut out for a shepherd. It takes the quiet, patient attention of a kindly, well-balanced man to successfully handle sheep. Some men are especially adapted for the horse business and others for dairying or swine raising. We have noticed that always the successful beeman, or poultryman, has a special temperament and adaptability for the business which he follows and it would be impossible to make such men change jobs and have them succeed equally well after the change.

The business of sheep breeding and feeding is best learned from first handling a few sheep and then increasing the flock as experience is gained. Failure in the past has come from certain well understood mistakes and these we shall in a few words point out here. They may be set down as follows: 1. Starting with scrub ewes and a scrub ram. It would be far better to start with five right ewes than a flock of wrong ones and the sheep to pick are those best adapted for the district in which they are to be raised. 2. Starting to keep sheep with the idea that they are intended for the business of weed and brush extermination. If a sheep is to act as a scavenger upon the farm good mutton and wool need not be expected. It is true that sheep will clean off weeds and brush if starved to do so; but the profit comes from generous feeding for a maximum production of wool or meat. Better keep goats for the weed and brush clearing business. 3. Wintering ewes on Timothy hay, straw and old weathered corn fodder, without succulent or laxative feed or grain. Sheep to do well should have clover or Alfalfa hay, roots or silage and grain such as whole oats and shelled corn with wheat bran added. Thousands of sheep die every winter and spring from impaction and liver trouble due to coarse bulky somewhat innutritious fodder. 4. Allowing sheep too little exercise and keeping them cooped up in hot, dirty, damp stables. Sheep need lots of exercise every day and must have dry, ventilated stables. Indeed they will do well with a shed open to the south, provided it is well bedded and kept dry and the sheep are not allowed to become wet or face cold, driving winds or snow. 5. Failure to adequately feed sheep just before and through the mating season that a big percentage of strong lambs may be obtained. It pays to feed at the time indicated and not to overtax the ram. 6. Feeding ewes and young lambs upon old, bare-bitten, worm-infected permanent pastures. Here the sheep contract worms and they are the bane of the business.

Start with a few high grade ewes and mate them with a pure bred ram of the breed used for the grading-up process, avoiding the errors we have outlined, and success will come in time. Experience will add a host of smaller but highly important things to the category we have printed here.

Sugar Beets

Owing to the high price of sugar last year was an exceptionally good one for the farmer who is engaged in growing sugar beets. In the Middle West the price was about six dollars per ton delivered on the track. Since beets produce under favorable conditions from 15 to 20 tons per acre this has made a very good return from the land. There is every probability that equally high prices will prevail for the next two or three years. It is our purpose to give our readers some directions that may prove helpful to them in the culture of this crop.

CROP SOLD BEFORE PLANTED.—One advantage in the growing of sugar beets is that the crop is usualy grown on contract,—that is, it is sold before planted. In this way the farmer knows exactly what his crop will bring. He can then give it extra care and cultivation with a full knowledge of exactly what the increased crop due to his extra efforts will bring. With most other crops an extra good yield over a large territory means a low price with perhaps little or no gain per acre, but with beets a good yield is certain to bring a high return for each acre cultivated. The contract fixes the price and the number of acres to be grown.

MAKE CONTRACTS EARLY.—Most contracts for the culture of sugar beets are made in the winter or early spring. It is important for the farmer to begin to think about this matter early in order to properly plan his work. For many, sugar beets will be a new crop. With all new crops the labor problem is the most important, particularly one requiring so large an amount of labor as do sugar beets. It is very important for the farmer to know exactly how many acres of sugar beets he is to grow in order that he may not only plan for this but also for the labor on the rest of his farm. The introduction of this one crop may necessitate to a very large degree the reorganization of the balance of his farm. This is very important and must not be overlooked. The making of sugar beet contracts early in the season therefore becomes of prime importance.

WHAT IT COSTS TO GROW BEETS.—Since there is a large amount of labor involved it costs a good deal per acre to grow sugar beets,—not less than $25 or $30, depending upon soil, machinery and the price of labor. Even at this rate five or six tons per acre will pay the labor cost, leaving the balance for profit. With a good crop the profit will then amount to from $50 to $75 per acre.

HOW TO GROW BEETS.—Sugar beets require fertile, well-drained, moist land. They do best in sandy loam and poorest on heavy clays. The ground should be heavily fertilized as for tobacco or potatoes by plowing under a heavy crop of clover or a rich coating of barnyard manure. The ground should be plowed deep,—not less than eight or ten inches, in order to loosen up the soil and to allow the large roots to penetrate it easily. It should be thoroughly pulverized and put in fine shape for seeding. About corn planting time the beets should be planted with a beet-seed drill made especially for the purpose. The rows should be at least sixteen inches apart to permit of easy cultivation with the horse.

BUNCHING AND THINNING.—When the plants come up they must be thinned. This is best done with the hoe. The hoe is used to cut out all between the bunches which are placed eight or ten inches apart. Here three or four plants are left, or enough to insure at least one strong beet in each bunch. Now comes the hardest part of sugar beet culture,—thinning. This of course must be done by hand leaving the strongest plant in each bunch.

CULTIVATION AND HARVESTING.—The cultivating is done with a horse cultivator though it is occasionally necessary to use the hoe to destroy the weeds and loosen up the dirt. In harvesting the beets are first lifted with a puller and then pulled and topped by hand. After topping they are thrown in piles and then hauled direct to the cars to be loaded. A good quality of beets properly topped will test 15 per cent of sugar and one ton will therefore produce 300 pounds of this sweet. An acre of sugar beets may yield as much as three tons of the manufactured product.

Some Uncommon Farm Crops

Speltz

This grain is but little known on American farms. It somewhat resembles both wheat and barley and yields as well or better, particularly in dry seasons. It was introduced into this country from Russia by the U. S. Department of Agriculture. It is cultivated and harvested in the same manner as other grains. As a feed for beef cattle it is fully the equal of barley and oats and almost as good as corn. This grain will doubtless be more extensively grown in this country when its merits become more wildly known.

Seradella

Seradella might well be called the "sandy soil clover." It is a small plant and produces its seeds in pods. It is particularly well adapted to sandy soils and can be used with profit as a green manuring crop for plowing under and adding nitrogen to the soil since it "catches" and grows on sand where red clover refuses to grow. This crop also does well on sour soils where clover refuses to grow because of a lack of lime; in fact seradella does not like lime. Cut and cured as hay it makes a most excellent feed.

Soy Beans

Soy beans, though well known in the South, are comparatively unknown throughout the northern half of the United States. The soy bean was introduced into this country from Japan. The beans are very small, sending up vigorous stalks and making a heavy growth of vines. They do especially well on light sandy soils and are particularly adapted to building up the fertility of these soils since they are rich in nitrogen. They belong to the legume family and hence take their nitrogen direct from the air. Cut and cured as hay they make an excellent feed for cattle and sheep. Their seeds are richer in nitrogen than those of any other grain. They are also heavy in oil. The ground beans are among the very best and highest priced oil and protein carrying feeds. Efforts are now being made to grow these beans as a substitute for flaxseed in the manufacture of oil for paints. Soy bean cake, obtained after the oil is removed, is the equal of linseed meal as a stock food.

The Fescues

Though the fescues are widely scattered they are little known because of their peculiar habits of growth; hence the seed is seldom called for by farmers. There are four principal varieties of this grass,—the various leaved fescue, the sheep's fescue, the meadow fescue and the creeping fescue. All of these are short in stature and form a thick bottom grass. For this reason they are particularly adapted to use in the making of lawns and permanent pasture. They should never be sown alone but mixed with other grasses. They all start very early in the spring and therefore produce early pastures and lawns.

Sanfoin

Sanfoin is a splendid crop for hilly and stony land. It will grow and do well where other crops fail to produce because of the thinness of the soil layer. Sanfoin is a kind of clover and somewhat resembles Alfalfa. It withstands drought well and the older plants are little affected by cold weather. The young plants are easily winter killed. It produces from one to two tons of high feeding value hay per acre. It is easier to cure thin red clover hay and when once seeded the same piece may be cut like Alfalfa for several

Managing an Incubator

IN the January number of COMFORT, I called attention to the importance of having strong, healthy birds in the breeding pens, and explained why a cellar or a north room should be chosen if the incubator has to be located in a dwelling house, as is usually the case when only one or two machines are being used. This month we will consider the important points in running the machine itself, and caring for the babies after they are hatched.

First of all, remember that the incubator must stand perfectly even. Nothing but the use of a carpenter's level can determine this point. Next, the machine must not stand under or near a window or door, or any opening which is likely to cause a draft. If the machine has been used before, thoroughly dust and disinfect it, no matter how well it was cleansed after last season's work. An accumulation of dust or a tiny cobweb in the heater may cause a lot of trouble and loss by causing the lamp to smoke.

Be sure that the lamp is in perfect order; no dents or cracked edges on the burner; hinges and snap in good condition, and every part perfectly clean. Put in a new wick which exactly fits the slot, for if the wick is the slightest bit narrow, air will creep up the edges, and probably cause the flame to flicker or smoke; and if it is too wide it won't turn up and down evenly.

Light the lamp, and allow the machine to warm up for several hours, then scrub and spray the entire inside of the egg chamber with hot water and some good germ killer. I have, at different times, used carbolic acid, mercuric chloride, peroxide, and several of the tar preparations. It really does not matter so much so long as enough is used.

Of course, the egg tray should be taken out of the machine and scrubbed top and bottom, and put near the kitchen stove, or out into the sun and air to dry. Leave the door of the machine open about half an inch, and the lamp burning, until all the moisture is dried out; then close up and allow the heat to reach 102 degrees, at which point regulate the automatic heat control according to the instructions sent out with the machine, and run it for a day or two before putting in the eggs, to assure yourself that the thermostat is working properly and that the tin disk over the heat escape closes down evenly when the lamp is removed for filling, and that it rises to the correct height after the lamp is replaced.

It is well to test the efficiency of the different parts which constitute the automatic control several times. After the machine has been running some hours with a moderate flame, the disk one sixteenth of an inch above the escape pipe, and the thermometer registering 102, open the door of the machine until the thermometer drops to 99; then close it. The disk should have shut down closely when the temperature went down, and if the thermostat and all the parts are working properly, the disk should again rise one sixteenth of an inch above the escape, and the thermometer again register 102 degrees within a few minutes after closing the door.

Should the disk swing to one side, or fail to rise with the change in temperature, study the maker's directions very carefully, and try to decide what is wrong. If the book of instructions gives no directions for remedying such difficulties, examine the wire which attaches the disk to the regulating arm and the disk itself. The slightest bend in the wire or kink in the disk is liable to cause the trouble, and must be carefully corrected. If neither wire nor disk are at fault, unscrew the connecting rod which runs through the machine and connects the thermostat with the regulating arm, draw it up three or four inches, and let it drop back. If it sticks, even in a slight degree, or fails to fall truly and evenly into place, it has got bent, and must be straightened, for if it rubs or binds, it will prevent its answering the automatic action of the thermostat.

You know, I suppose, that the thermostat is composed of such sensitive metal that it immediately expands or contracts with variation of heat in the egg chamber. This expansion or contraction affects the connecting rod, and the rod in turn influences the regulating arm, at the end of which the disk which controls the escape of heat is suspended.

I have given this short, rough explanation of the connecting influence of the different parts which constitute the automatic heat control in all modern incubators for the benefit of the men and women who may be running an incubator for the first time, and who have no knowledge of such matters, for the directions sent out with some incubators just tell how to connect the parts, and give no explanation of cause and effect to guide the poor amateur if anything goes wrong.

When the machine is running evenly, and you are sure that everything is properly adjusted, the trays can be filled with eggs and the hatch started. When the cold trays and eggs go into the machine, the temperature will run down, and the disk close tightly over the escape. Don't turn up the lamp, or be anxious if the heat does not seem to be recovering. One hundred and fifty or two hundred eggs may take from ten to twelve hours to heat through, so if you put the full trays in at night, the heat will not regain the 102 mark on the thermometer until the following morning. Of course, fewer eggs will not take so long to heat, but still you need not worry, for if the machine was running properly before the eggs were put into it, and the lamp has not been interfered with in any way, the thermostat will respond to the increasing heat, as the eggs warm, and as it expands, the connecting rod will have tightened on the regulating arm, and the disk would be lifted from the top of the escape at the right time to hold the temperature in the machine at 102. If the lamp flame had been turned up at the time when the eggs were put into the machine, the heat might have increased during the long hours of the night beyond the controlling power of the thermostat. For it must be clearly understood that if the heat in the egg chamber of the ordinary machine gets above 110, the automatic control is lost, and there is great danger of the thermostat getting cracked and ruined. This is a point which is frequently not understood.

People don't realize the limitations of the automatic control in an incubator. The thermostat cannot maintain the temperature in the egg chamber beyond a variation of ten or fifteen degrees at the most. It is for this reason that it is so much safer to locate incubators in a cellar or north room, where the outdoor changes in temperature are not felt so rapidly as they would be in a south room, and why the attendant should always clean and trim the lamp in the morning, so making it possible to watch that it does not run up after first lighting, and why it is advisable to use a moderate flame when heating up and regulating the machine; for with the machine set with a moderate flame, it is possible to turn it up slightly on an unusually cold night, or down for the occasional hot day in early spring which so often upsets our calculations.

During the last few years, the agricultural colleges and experiment stations have been giving more and more study to the subject of moisture in incubation, until now it is generally conceded that it is quite as important as heat, and that a lack of sufficient moisture during the early days of incubation is frequently the cause of weakly, slow growing chicks. When one understands the process of development from the germ to the embryo chick and subsequent growth till it reaches the stage where it breaks through the shell, there can be little doubt that we should give full attention to this point.

The white of a newly laid egg is largely composed of water, which keeps it in a liquid state. The shell of the egg being porous, allows this water to evaporate, and the white to become thick and sticky; if the egg is kept for any considerable time, in dry air, it will all evaporate.

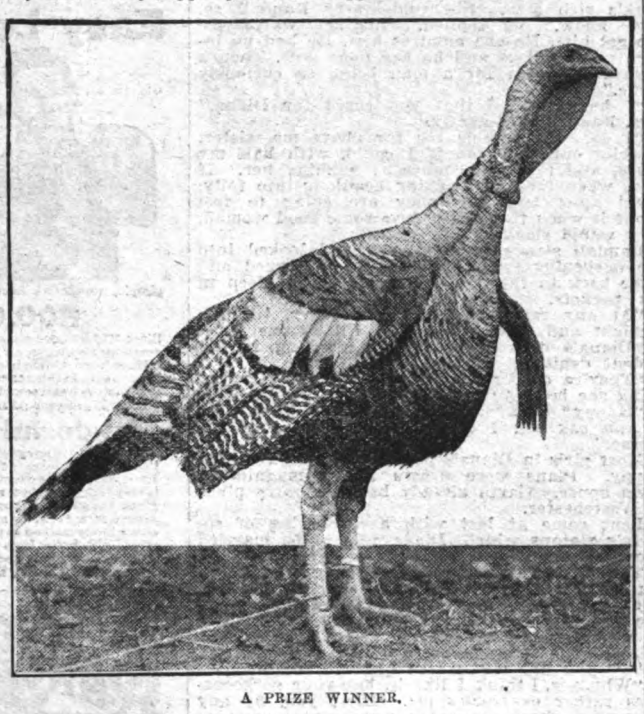
When the germ of the egg is quickened into life by the heat of the incubator or under the hen, tiny veins run out into the white and absorb the water and certain nutriment which is converted into the blood of the embryo and nourishes it during the building of its structure and the formation of its organs.

When an egg is put into an incubator situated in a dry room and heated up to 102 or 103 degrees, the air in the machine must necessarily be dry, and the watery contingent of the white evaporates so rapidly that the embryo lacks blood and nutriment, with the result that when hatched it has weak internal organs, and can never become a really vigorous and profitable bird—like as an egg producer or a breeder. For this reason the amount of moisture in the egg chamber is most important. Too much is as detrimental as too little.

Now we come to the question as to what is the correct amount and how to gauge it. When a good hygrometer is used in the incubator, the attendant has only to read what it registers, just as he reads the thermometer to know the amount of heat which is present.

During the first week, the hygrometer should register 75 degrees; the thermometer 102 to 102½. Second week; hygrometer, 70; thermometer 102½ to 103.

During the third week we have a changed condition of affairs. The small systems of blood vessels of the first week have vastly increased, so that by the fourteenth day the white of the egg is full of veins in which the blood is rapidly circulating and the chick's body is growing fast. Bear in mind that the first ten days are devoted to development, and in that short time the chick is fully formed in all its parts. During this period the quantity of blood circulation is comparatively small.



Then come the ten days of growth, or increase in size of body and its parts, when great quantities of blood are rushing through the numerous blood vessels, carrying the building material. It is during this latter period that the water (after being used in the blood circulation) should be allowed to escape freely from the egg with consequent rapid enlargement of the air cell. Therefore, during the last week of incubation I would remove the water pans or wet sand from the egg chamber and let the humidity decrease even to 50 degrees, or possibly 40 in some cases. Simply removing the extra supply of water usually answers the purpose.

The moisture supply must be renewed on the nineteenth day for another distinct purpose. If the air surrounding the hatching eggs is dry, the chicks are likely to have a hard time breaking through the tough inner linings of the eggs. When this parchment like lining is dry, it is exceedingly difficult to tear it, and its strong bands may hold a vigorous chick a prisoner even after it has broken the outer shell clear around.

Keeping the air of the egg chamber moist renders the inner linings of the egg shell easy for the chick to burst through.

The greatest danger from overheating comes during the first few days of incubating. It is well to hold the temperature at the level of tops of the eggs under 103 F. for the first week. I like to keep it at 102.

During the third week the animal heat exerts home influence, and 103 will be about right at the upper part of the egg.

A PRIZE WINNER.

While the chicks are hatching from the eggs, 104 may be registered at the level of the tops of the eggs. In some parts of our country, where incubators are operated at altitudes of several thousand feet, the temperatures may be run a degree higher than I have indicated. At these altitudes where the air is usually very dry, the matter of extra moisture supply becomes a very important item in successful incubation.

Ventilation is Vital

During the early stages of embryo development in the egg, very little air is needed, because there is very little blood to be oxidized. During the second week there is increased blood circulation, and therefore need of some ventilation, so that the fresh air shall supply enough oxygen. All through the third week there must be abundant air supply, because at this period there is a very great circulation of the red blood, which must be continually using oxygen from the air. The pure air passes through the shell of the egg to the blood vessels that ramify all over the inner lining of the egg. Carbon dioxide and moisture pass out through the shell.

If an egg chamber is poorly ventilated, the eggs should be aired once daily for a few minutes at a time, from the fourth to the twelfth day, and twice daily during the last week of incubation.

In dealing with the development and growth of the chick embryo it is evident that temperature, humidity, and ventilation must be under complete control, and that common sense should be used in the controlling.

If you have no hygrometer, the amount of moisture can be told if a broody hen is given eggs at the same time that the incubator is started. On the fifth or sixth day, compare the condition of the eggs under the hen with those in the incubator, by holding up first one and then the other to the light in your egg tester. Note the size of the air space at the large end of the egg. It grows larger as the water in the white is consumed, either by the developing embryo or by evaporation. If all is right in the incubator, the air cell will be the same size in eggs taken from under the hen and out of the incubator. But if the air in the egg chamber of the machine is too dry, the air cell in the incubator eggs will be more developed than in the eggs taken from under the hen. If, on the other hand, the air cell is smaller in the eggs taken from the incubator, the air in the machine is too moist.

Now, to correct this condition, if moisture is lacking, put pans of wet sand, or one or two sponges squeezed out of warm water in the bottom of the machine. Remember that whatever is used to add moisture must be warm. Never put anything cold into the machine after the hatch once starts. If there is too much moisture, which is sometimes the case when the machine is located in a wet, poorly ventilated cellar, the eggs must be kept out of the machine longer each day, when you air and turn them.

If the cellar is cold, put a warm blanket over them, for part of the time that they are out of the machine. Place pans of unslaked lime on the floor of the cellar; it will absorb the moisture and help to purify the air.

I. L. M.—From your description of the bird's condition, and the spots on liver and lungs, I judge the fowls have what is called coccidiosis, which is a germ disease, and attacks rats and mice and small animals, such as rabbits. Eggs laid by hens with a chronic form of this disease are likely to carry germs which will develop into white diarrhea in a chick hatched from them. Wild birds, pigeons or rats may introduce the germs into the poultry yard by means of their droppings, as the disease is transmitted through food or water being contaminated. Young chickens succumb to the disease at once, but adult birds or animals have a great power of resisting it, and usually only carry it in a chronic form which does them little harm, but spreads it broadcast among the rest of the poultry; for it is only occasionally, after long duration, that an adult animal or bird dies from it. The best treatment is to feed a mash made by moistening ground grain with Castor oil. Don't be afraid of the oil—it won't hurt if each bird gets two or three teaspoonfuls. Add three grains of sulphate of iron to each quart of drinking water every day for three weeks. Repeat the mash treatment each week. The germs of this disease are very difficult to get rid of, so everything in and about the poultry house and runs should be thoroughly cleansed and disinfected. If the house has a dirt floor, scrape off the surface to a depth of three inches, and fill in with clean, dry dirt. Use a strong solution of cresol on perches and dishes, and on fixtures. Mites are very small and round, so I think the vermin you found on the birds were lice. Use Dalmatian powder. Hold the bird by the feet with head down; saturate the feathers with the powder, especially in the soft fluff around the thighs and underbody and tail; then rub it in with the fingers. The work should be done after dark at night, and the hen put carefully on the roost, so that she doesn't shake all the powder out before it has had time to do its work. To successfully rid the birds of vermin of any kind, the powdering should be repeated three times, with intervals of three nights between applications, and during that period the house, nests, and perches should be treated with sheep dip, or some strong preparation of that kind.

J. H.—As the birds were Rhode Island Reds and Plymouth Rocks in their second and third year, and as you have been feeding very heavily, there is little doubt that they had acute liver trouble, as lameness in the left leg and shrinking of the comb are all symptoms usually seen in the last stages of that disease. Stop feeding mash at noon; instead give one pint of wheat or oats for every ten birds, and scatter it in deep litter on the chicken-house floor, so that they will have to scratch for it. As soon as the warm weather comes, give nothing at all at noon, as they are on free range. Such heavy feeding as you have been giving forces pullets and young hens into egg production at first, but always causes trouble later, especially with any of the heavy breeds, like Plymouth Rocks.

G. W.—Four Leghorn roosters would be sufficient for fifty-eight hens, but as you have the extra bird, I advise you to let him run with the flock.

D. H.—Rhode Island Reds and Plymouth Rocks, like all the heavy type of fowls, are given to getting broody at all seasons. I know of no way to cure them of the habit. The only thing to do is to make one or two small coops with wire bottoms and put a perch in each; then when your birds get broody, shut them up in these coops for two or three days. They don't like sitting or standing on the wire netting, and the constant roosting soon breaks them of their desire to set.

L. A. D.—You are quite right in thinking that much of your mother's success with turkeys was due to the fact that she kept them far away from other poultry, and scrupulously clean. I keep the White Hol-

He That Loseth His Life

By Maud Mary Brown

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

IT was the most violent of all the nights of that record-breaking month of November. By eleven o'clock only those whose business demanded it were abroad. Trolleys, in diabolical haste to finish their run, scooted over glistening rails; taxicabs skidded drunkenly, and infrequent pedestrians bent to the storm and scurried for shelter.

Only The Girl, walking eastward from the Pennsylvania Terminal, was deliberate, and her leisure obviously was prompted by uncertainty. Her pretty clothes were insufficient protection from the elements and already they looked sodden and bedraggled.

Occasional steps sounded behind her, and when they passed on to be lost in the noises of the night, she breathed relief.

Presently there came steps that lagged as they reached her side. It was what she had been dreading and she shrank as a voice sounded at her elbow.

"I beg your pardon," The Man began: "It is a misfortune to be without an umbrella on a night like this. Perhaps you will come under mine."

He held his umbrella over her shrinking form and fell into step beside her.

"I—I am looking for a policeman," she explained, conquering her fear. "I wish to be directed to an address."

"We shall find one a little farther on," The Man replied; "but perhaps I can help you."

His interest had been trapped by a closer vision of The Girl. She was bewilderingly pretty in her anxiety. The loose ends of her dark hair fell into adorable tendrils about her face; her eyes—he could see them as they passed under a light—were like perfectly-matched sapphires; her voice and her simple mourning garments bespoke race and distinction.

"Where did you want to go?" he asked after a brief silence.

"To West One Hundred and Twenty-fourth street," she replied after a slight hesitation.

"So far? Then I'll call a taxicab."

"Oh, no!" protested The Girl nervously.

"Then the subway will be best. We will board the first cross-town car."

"Couldn't I walk?" she entreated; "you see, I have—no money. I came North to visit my cousin and she did not meet me, though I sent her a telegram after the wreck. I happened to have just enough for that in my coat pocket."

"The wreck?"

She nodded wearily. "The train that I came up on. I lost everything; a fire started, you see." She shuddered at the memory.

"What hard luck! I'm glad now that my car skidded back there and did something to a wheel so that I was compelled to walk; otherwise, I should not have come across you. Here is our officer; should you like to ask him any questions before we set out to find your cousin?"

She shook her head as the officer saluted her companion.

"Now then, we're going to signal the first vacant taxicab. You've been under a strain too long to make it wise for you to jostle up-town in a subway train."

"You're very good; I'll get some money from Cousin Clorinda to pay you. I hate New York!" she added fiercely.

The Man hailed a cab and after handing her in, he followed, and they speeded northward. The Girl peering out into the city's night, The Man watching her, silent.

"Here we are," he said cheerfully when at last the car swerved in to the curb.

"Wait!" he ordered the driver as they crossed the walk together.

The slumbering hall boy roused himself at The Man's sharp questions.

"Mis' Elkins?" he blinked; "why, Mis' Elkins moved out two weeks ago, sir; she's gone to California or somewhere. The day boy'll know."

The color receded from The Girl's cheeks.

"Come," urged The Man gently. "There is no use lingering here. We will plan in the car." Dazed, she followed him to the waiting cab.

"I am afraid," he began, when they were under way, "that a hotel is out of the question in the condition you're in; besides, you have no luggage."

"The Young Woman's Christian Association?" The Girl suggested, her eyes on her dripping garments.

"It's past midnight; I am afraid——"

"But what can a girl in my position do?" she asked wildly.

"Of course there are the police stations with their matrons, but they are not for your kind. Here is my suggestion and you may take it or leave it: Come to my apartment where you can be comfortable for the few hours that are left of the night. When my man comes in the morning, he will press your clothing. In the meantime, you can decide what to do. But of course you will go home."

"I have no home; my father died two weeks ago."

"I am sorry. Will you come?"

The Girl hesitated.

"Remember that this is New York," he resumed, "I presume you have heard lurid tales about us; we are unconventional, but we are quite as righteous as others."

"You are awfully kind. I feel a brute for having dragged you all these miles for nothing."

The Man gave the driver an address and they rocketed down the street. In a few minutes they stood together in the hall of The Man's apartment while he flooded the place with light.

The Girl was surprised at the sumptuousness of her surroundings. Her feet slid through heavy-napped rugs; lights glowed dimly through shades of rose; heavy-scented flowers drugged the air; pictures, insolent of conception, hung between priceless tapestries.

"Better than a police station, what?" smiled her host. "And now, you for that room yonder to get out of your wet clothes. Wait! I will give you a kimono to put on. It is one of my treasures and it once belonged to a court beauty of Japan."

He laid across her arm a soft robe of sapphire blue, its impudent pattern scrolled in dull rose.

"Don't be long," he urged as she turned to the door.

When she reappeared to The Man she had been transformed from a pretty girl to a wonderfully seductive woman. The blue of the robe darkened her eyes; excitement rouged the cheeks that had gone white in her distress. She dimpled at The Man's surprise.

"Where," he demanded sternly, "is the girl who went into that room?"

"Present. Present, and very, very hungry."

"Impertinent! Sit here, then. This chair does nicely for a throne. I will go and rustle some food."

In a few seconds she had followed him to the rear of the apartment. "Please let me help," she pleaded; "when I am alone my eyes simply won't stay open and directly I close them I see that fire creeping toward me."

"Nerves! And small wonder. If you ask me, you've been rather brave. Of course you may help. Only, as you value your immortal soul, don't spot that robe."

"I'll be careful," she promised, and he noticed that the strain had left her voice.

It was a cheerful feast. Rain battered at the windows only to emphasize the firelight comfort within. The Man poured some bubbling wine into a glass and handed it to her.

"It is precisely what you need after your experience," he told her, and she drank it all.

A little later she grew drowsy in her throne-like chair.

"Now," he decided, "you are going to bed."

But a look of terror filled The Girl's eyes.

"I am afraid," she shuddered. "The wreck! The creeping fire! They haunt me."

Gently The Man led her to a couch, half-supporting her as he rearranged the cushions. Then he lowered her, unresisting, among them, and sat down on the edge of the couch, stroking her slender hands.

"It is all right—quite all right," he soothed. "You are here with me—safe."

"What is it, Hermione?" Barry Randall had just claimed a dance with his widowed sister-in-law at the Dents' ball.

"I have been watching you. At first I thought it was the flame-colored chiffons, but it goes deeper than that. You are shockingly radiant."

"I've wanted to tell you for a week, Barry, but I was waiting for Andrew's letter saying that Diana might come."

"Diana?"

"Diana Leigh—the little distant cousin whom I rounded up on a run-down estate the last time I was South. Andrew is her brother—the oldest of a dozen, I should think. They are orphans and these boys and a pack of noisy dogs have been Diana's only companions. They adore her. If anything should happen to her up here, I think Andrew would come up with his rusty gun to enquire why."

Randall laughed lightly. "You speak as though this is a lion's den. What on earth could happen to her?"

"Things do, you know; broken hearts and things like that."

Randall's face softened and he gave her a swift, warm glance. He had never forgiven his brother for his failure to make Hermione happy.

"She is an adorable child, Barry. But, please, I'm afraid it's hands off for you. Your past hasn't exactly qualified you as woman's tutelar angel. I wouldn't wish her pulses to be accelerated by you, you inconstant wretch! There is Gilbert Garth looking for me. I don't like that man."

"Who does? When may I see you, sister?"

"Soon, please. Diana comes early next week. Come and help me plan festivities for her."

Diana Leigh reached New York in the twilight of a winter's day and as she drove up-town with Mrs. Randall, she was absorbed by the crowds, the lights, the brilliant windows.

"How good you are!" she breathed, enraptured.

"I wonder," Mrs. Randall returned, her eyes on the girl's lovely face.

"Of course you are. I didn't begin to appreciate it till I saw all this. Andrew disliked giving his consent to my coming, I am sure. Do you know, Cousin Hermione, sometimes I suspect a sad chapter in his life."

Hermione smiled at Diana's seriousness.

"Well, I'm here, anyway," the girl chattered on; "I'm here and loving it."

Barry Randall was at the house when the two reached home.

"How like you to be on hand with a welcome!" Hermione said. "Diana, this is my husband's brother; he will claim you for a cousin, but the decision rests with you."

"Then I adopt him instantly," laughed Diana, extending her slim, brown hand.

During the hour which followed, Hermione felt surprise at Diana's poise. That she was a gentlewoman went without saying, but it scarcely seemed probable that her life could have schooled her in the give-and-take of drawing-room repartee, yet she tossed and parried with ease, though her color rose in the game.

"May he come again soon?" she asked as Randall rose to leave.

"Barry runs in and out as his fickle fancy dictates," Hermione replied.

She followed him to the hall, her eyes demanding his verdict.

"She is adorable, sister. Don't let success spoil her; she is certain to have it."

Diana was at the fire when Hermione rejoined her.

"Tired, honey?"

"Not tired, but very much bewildered, Cousin Hermione. I do like Cousin Barry."

"All women do," was Mrs. Randall's reply; "and men, too," she added quickly.

Followed days filled with shopping, fittings, hair dressers and manicures, interspersed with informal luncheons and teas. Like a wise campaigner, Mrs. Randall was doing some preliminary skirmishing before definitely launching Diana upon the social wave.

It all wearied Diana a trifle. It was so different from her accustomed life and she was not quite sure that she cared for the delirium.

Very soon came the night of her formal bow to New York. In all its brilliant past the Randall house had not appeared to better advantage, nor had its mistress.

As for Diana, she was unconsciously alluring, holding eyes weary and sated with beauty. Her heavy dull gold hair made a nimbus for her piquant face; her brown eyes with their topaz lights asked disconcerting questions; her diaphanous white frock upon which Hermione had spent so much thought, suited her unspoiled beauty.

"She is taking well," Randall assured Mrs. Randall. "But why," he added swiftly, "does she evade me? And she no longer calls me 'cousin'; how have I failed her?"

"Why, I don't know, Barry; she has been rather silent lately. I wonder if she has probed the sham of our lives; if she sees beneath our masks. We are a rather contemptible lot of pleasure-seekers, you know. Should you care, Barry?"

"I care like the devil to have her think well of me. I am having a dance with her soon."

Dancing, Diana was at her best. "There's nothing of the reluctant-feet business about you tonight, is there?" Randall bantered as they swung to the rhythm of the music.

"Not reluctant, but terribly awkward, I fear. I wish they would stop thinking up new steps till I get caught up."

Diana's remoteness as she coolly thanked him for the gorgeous flowers he had sent her puzzled him and made him rather silent.

"Who is the man who is greeting Cousin Hermione?" Diana suddenly asked.

"That," Randall replied briefly, "is Gilbert Garth, one of the most eligible bachelors in the city."

"So that is Gilbert Garth! And you don't like him; one can tell from your voice. Will you whirl me back to my cousin now, please? Here we are. Thank you, and—good night."

Randall accepted his dismissal, turning away as Garth was presented to Diana, but he was in time to take note of the spark that shot into the man's colorless eyes. Then he went home.

"May I call this afternoon?" Garth was bending over Diana's golden head as the notes of the last dance died.

"Do! But I shall be stupid. I am not yet trained to your city pace."

The last guest gone, Diana would have lingered to chat, but Mrs. Randall drove her off to bed without ceremony.

"What would Andrew say to these hours?" she demanded.

"He'd growl!" laughed Diana. "I am sure he would like Gilbert Garth, however. He is going to call this afternoon, Cousin Hermione. I like him tremendously; he is so different from the others—the acquisitive, intriguing others."

"Run along, dear."

Holding her soft draperies about her, Diana slowly mounted the staircase. She was very restless, and dawn crept in at the windows before she slept. Her last waking thoughts were for Andrew and Gilbert Garth. Between the two there seemed to be some mysterious association. Her first dream thoughts were for Barry Randall.

During the days which preceded her debut, Diana had made many friends. It was a favorable season for intimate friendships. The great war had aroused the facile sympathy of society and gayeties were curtailed while unaccustomed fingers fashioned garments for the men in the trenches.

For this purpose Diana spent two mornings a week with the girls of the younger set, listening, pondering, learning.

By no means ignorant of the abstract wickedness in life, she had never dreamed that it could touch her intimately, but, according to these girls, many of the men with whom they all danced freely were unequivocally bad, and the morals of some of the women were not above reproach.

"How revolting!" The words had slipped out after she had heard a tale about a man with whom she had flirted at a dansant the day previous.

"A woman has to take life as she finds it, my dear," a young philosopher offered. "One can't go about with a missionary spirit—not in our set."

They laughed—all but Diana. She felt a spiritual revulsion for it all. Life's canvas was shifting before her bewildered eyes, and experience was toning in repellent colors.

Unconsciously she tried to adjust her ideals without sacrificing them entirely and in those days she altered subtly. Her face took on a searching expression new to it and her eyes, hitherto so wide and frank, narrowed slightly, as though the sensitive retina had been injured.

She began to speculate about every one with whom she was thrown. She recalled how, at first, her boyish interest in life had been misinterpreted, resulting in mild familiarities which had won her flashing rebuke. She flushed at the remembrance. Had they thought her light? It was then that she became remote. But it added to her desirability. Men relish the challenge.

More than any of the others, she wondered about Barry Randall. Then, on gossip's tongue, came a garbled and exaggerated chapter from his past. She never called him "Cousin Barry" after that.

It was, perhaps, not strange that she looked forward to Gilbert Garth's return to the city with interest, for here was a man, they all admitted it, who had kept his moral head. People derided him and disliked him, but to the mind of the girl, that spoke ill of his judges.

When, on the night of the ball, she looked into his colorless eyes for the first time, she forced her heart to warm to him and her eyes away from Randall's retreating back. Here, at last, was a man like Andrew!

Diana awoke after her ball to find Hermione smiling down at her.

"Why, it's late!" she cried, starting up. "I hear Felice running my bath. Wait, dear, till I've plunged."

Later, over coffee, "Did I please you?" she asker naively.

"I haven't seen such a flutter over a debutante in years," smiled Hermione.

"I shall write that to Andrew. I loved it last night. And to think that for days I've been loathing New York!"

"Loathing it, Diana?"

"All of it. I made faces at Felice directly her back was turned. She embarrassed me so! And those warm, perfumed baths after my accustomed cold plunges! I hated the constant thought of my body. And I hated the people, too—all but you with their scandals and their license. But I've stopped. All I ask now is happiness. That isn't much for a girl to demand, is it?"

"It is more than most of us get, my dear."

"Did I tell you that Gilbert Garth is coming to see me today? I like him, Cousin Hermione. Do you?"

Hermione was momentarily disconcerted by this abrupt demand.

"I see that you don't," Diana resumed. "Well, I do. I am thankful that I do not need the spice of sin to season my portion of life."

"Don't talk nonsense, dear. The quality of goodness never detracted from a man's popularity yet. Barry will be around for tea, too."

Diana was suddenly silent.

"What has Barry done, Diana? He notices your avoidance of him."

"He hasn't done anything to me."

"You don't want to lose sight of the fact, Diana, that Barry is a man with a quality of honor that can be depended upon in a crisis."

Diana shrugged her pretty shoulders and Mrs. Randall, not altogether easy in her mind, left her to her reflections.

From their first meeting it was obvious that Garth loved Diana, but when, after a whirlwind courtship, the girl told her cousin of her betrothal, Hermione felt a distinct shock.

It seemed absurd to regret seeing her young cousin established as the wife of one of New York's rich men. She told Barry Randall so.

"I know," he replied. "Instinct warns me against him. No one admires him. He had no intimates in college and he has none now. There's always a reason for a man being so curiously alone."

"I have fancied that you cared for Diana," Mrs. Randall said gently.

"I do. But she is too far above me, sister. I'd blot out the past, if I could, with half my years, and take my chance at winning her. If men, when they are rushing headlong into folly, could appreciate how they are going to feel about it when they really love some good woman, they would slacken their pace."

Randall strode to a window and looked into the darkening street. Presently he turned and came back to the fire, his hands thrust deep in his pockets.

"At any rate, from now on, sister, it's the straight and narrow for me. I'll be one jewel in Diana's crown," he added, laughing in impudent denial of his emotion.

"They're coming now," he went on. "Do you think she is happy, Hermione?"

"Happy? Yes. But I doubt if she loves him. If you ask me, I think she is blinded by his virtue."

Most girls in Diana's position would have been happy. Plans were drawn for a magnificent town house. Garth already had a country place in Westchester.

Lent came at last with a slackening of society's riotous whirl. Diana was to be married shortly after Easter.

Toward the end of Lent, Garth gave a small tea for Diana in his rooms. She naturally felt a strong desire to see his quarters, and when she and Hermione, the first by several minutes to arrive, were admitted, she felt a startled surprise at the sumptuousness of her surroundings.

"Do you like it?" Garth queried, smiling.

"Why, yes, I think I like it, but your gorgeousness rather overcomes me. Have you, by any chance, a ghost about the premises? I seem to sense one."

"We're too ultra-modern here for that," he laughed, watching with satisfaction Hermione's departure into the next room on a little tour of inspection.

Then, bending, he drew Diana to him in a more unrestrained embrace than he had ever given her. "Wonder-girl!" he breathed.

She drew back, hands braced against his shoulders. "Please," she begged.

He drew her close again and Diana shrank under his hot kisses. She fought silently for release, but it was not till he had his fill of the sweetness of her lips that he let her go.

Diana trembled with unexplainable anger and before she had quite time to control herself the guests began to arrive.

Randall came later. Garth had balked at asking him, but Diana had insisted.

"He is really one of the family," she explained.

"He isn't the kind of man I want you to know," maintained Garth.

"I believe he is perfectly honorable," Diana defended, her loyalty fired.

Garth's eyes sharpened unpleasantly. "My wife must not defend the voluptuaries of New York," he warned. But he invited Randall.

Barry noticed Diana's pallor the moment he entered the room. "Not quite fit?" he asked upon reaching her side.

"This room is torrid and Garth's flowers are deadly. Let me take you out of the crush for a moment."

As they strolled into an adjoining room, Diana felt Garth's eyes upon her but she was curiously indifferent.

Randall had no sooner placed her in an easy chair when Garth's man summoned him to another room to answer a telephone call.

Alone, Diana rose and walked to the door which gave to the hall, drawn by some psychic urge.

Down near the entrance she saw her fiance, and with him was a woman above whom Garth towered menacingly. There was something sinister in the scene and while Diana watched from among the concealing shadows, she saw Garth open the door and heard his incisive voice.

"Get out!" he said.

Gropingly the woman obeyed, and in the next instant Garth had rejoined his guests.

"The ghost!" were the words on Diana's lips almost spoken aloud.

of adobe wall. A deep silence reigned; no one had the spirit to speak. The door finally yielded; they passed through it and instantly received the most delightful surprise of their lives. They stood in a long pergola covered with climbing roses and lined with rows of jars filled with blooming flowers. The opposite end let out on a stretch of lawn shaded with fruit trees and bordered by flower beds. Just to the left of the pergola and facing the lawn was the house. From its wide, brick-paved porch or mirador, as the Mexicans call it, one could look beyond the lawn and flowers to dark masses of fig trees, which with a second pergola at right angles to the first, screened from view the gardener's shack and that part of the grounds planted in vegetables.

"This is Heaven," exclaimed Toughey.

"The only one you will find in Mexico," declared Mrs. Deering, thinking of a Mexican town's unscreened meat shops, bakeries and markets; the indifference of its people with regard to contagious diseases; their ignorance of many sanitary measures insisted upon by an American community.

The children were equally wild over the extreme beauty of the place.

"I thought you would like it," said Mrs. Fenner, pleased that they should so unreservedly commend her selection of their summer home, and blissfully ignorant of their first impressions.

At the back of the mirador an archway led to a small patio set about with potted plants after the Mexican fashion, from which a door, properly the front entrance, opened directly into another street. A gate in the garden gave them a third outlet. Some of the rooms, of which there were many, opened into the patio others on the mirador, and a few into the garden. An American bathroom with hot and cold water seemed the best feature of the house, though time revealed that the hot water was more or less a fiction.

"Let's lock all the doors and gates, lose the keys and live here forever," proposed Toughey. Mrs. Deering smiled. After all it was delightful to begin this way. The place with its attractive combination of Spanish beauty and American comfort and taste was the work of its owner, an American woman whose husband had made a good sale of some mining property. Mrs. Fenner admitted, however, that since the wife's gratification of her ideas and fancies there had not been so much money in hand and that her proposition to rent the house for the Deerings had been eagerly accepted. As the servants went with the house they presently made the acquaintance of Chauna, the cocenera or cook; Juana, the canarista or housegirl; Pablo, the mosa or houseman; Francisco, the gardnener and lastly Candelaria, the diminutive kitchen helper. With such a staff of retainers, Toughey and the children were more than ever eager to relieve their mother of the duties of housekeeping, and incidentally to learn to speak Spanish. Under this plan Mrs. Deering proceeded to a leisurely survey of the books in the library, the music on the piano and the unusual variety of flowers in the garden.

For several days there was a noticeable irregularity of meals. Mrs. Deering's coffee was inexplicably halted in the mornings; the midday meal arrived with a lateness hitherto unknown in the household, while marienda, the Mexican substitute of chocolate and cakes for afternoon tea and designed to be served in the garden about five o'clock, came only with the dark and altogether squeezed out supper.

"Mamma," declared Toughey firmly, "that old saw about being a Roman in Rome is all right to talk about but it doesn't work."

"You mean to say you are going to oppose the Mexican custom," laughed her mother.

"I certainly do. I don't propose to have today's dinner day after tomorrow. Hereafter this household is to be run after American methods."

"I'd like to bet on you Toughey, but I am afraid I'd lose my money."

"You'll see," said Toughey with a slight lift of her pointed chin.

It now came out that Mrs. Fenner, with benevolent intention, had given the girls a great deal of advice, based upon the idea that it is well for strangers to follow the customs of the people among whom they have come to live. None of the women of Durango, Mexican or foreign, went to market. They sent their servants who did all the buying. "The cook starts for market right after breakfast and gets back a quarter of an hour before an early dinner hour," explained Toughey.

There followed, upon her resolution, a tremendous effort, backed by American pluck and energy and persistence to anticipate, circumvent and reform Mexican customs. But alas, with such partial success that at the end of the summer Toughey admitted that, except when she and the children remained in the kitchen and with their own hands hurried affairs, they were never able to overcome the strangling Mexican idea that "Manana" (tomorrow) or the day after was the best time for doing anything.

Of the market place the Deerings never tired. Through it flowed the life of the people, and there one could buy anything from a saddle to a poll parrot. The poorest peon with perhaps but a centavo could become a purchaser, for melons were sold by the slice, cabbages in small wedges, beans by the handful. So great is the poverty of the lowest classes that many a time Toughey bought a single egg at her doorway, offered by some wretched peon and representing his sole marketable possession. It was not unusual for beggars suffering with smallpox to ask alms on the plea of illness. "And you know they are speaking the truth," Toughey would remark significantly.

At the Plaza, where they frequently went in the evening to hear the band play, the wealthy class was more in evidence, but it never was possible to get entirely away from the misery of the people which seemed present even in the plaintive music of the country. The social center of every Mexican town, it was at the Plaza that the Deerings met many of the American residents of the town and pursued their acquaintance with those who had called. It was here, too, that courtship among the youthful part of the population took place. The process was quite simple, consisting in the beginning of an interchange of languishing glances while the men and girls promenaded around the Plaza in lines facing each other. A bolder step was the offer of a flower. A red one signified love, a white one the desire for a betrothal, whereas a yellow flower declared that love on the part of the donor had ceased. These customs afforded the Deering family considerable entertainment, especially when they were directed toward Toughey and Nan, who was now fourteen and from the Mexican point of view, in the marriage market. Toughey would laugh, go home and write to Roger Hewett, now testing in the business world his natural ability and the practical value of his college training.

As the summer advanced the Deerings yielded more and more to the enervating effects of the climate, but the charm of their surroundings and a certain romantic quality in the life they led, held to the end. One day some cards were brought to Mrs. Deering and when she and Toughey entered their beautiful sala (parlor) where they received visitors they found themselves greeting the portly Mexican lady whose effects had caused such a stir among the customs officials at the border. With her were two velvet-eyed daughters about Toughey's age. Educated in the states these girls proved interesting types evidencing in their lives the influence of American standards and customs. Their acquaintance with Toughey gradually ripened into a kind of intimacy and when their mother extended Toughey an invitation to visit them at

Second Inauguration of President Wilson

By Edna Mary Colman

As this issue goes to press before the inauguration our description is limited strictly to such features as have been definitely planned and arranged for. They will be carried out exactly according to program unless rendered impracticable by stormy weather or prevented by some untoward event. It has been intimated that the most of the public features would be omitted in case of hostilities growing out of our critical relations with Germany.—EDITOR.

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

WOODROW WILSON is the first Democrat since Andrew Jackson to succeed himself as President of the United States. This being the second occasion of the kind in the last eighty-five years the Democrats gave lavish expression to their natural elation, by arranging that the ceremonies attending President Wilson's reinauguration should be as unique and impressive as possible.

Clinedinst Studio, Washington, D. C.

MRS. JAMES H. BOGGS.

Because of the President and Vice-president not being inducted into office for the first time, the festivities lack the element of novelty that always attends the installation of a new Chief Executive and the introducing of a new family to the presidential mansion, especially as when they are strangers to the general public and the residents of the Capital city. However the inaugural committee has worked for weeks in revising features and elaborating the details to make this the most original and magnificent spectacle of its kind that has regaled the throngs that gather in ever increasing numbers to witness each successive inauguration, for this inaugural will go down in history distinguished for its innovations. Fate and circumstance have aided in the novelty producing, for this is the fourth time that the fourth of March, inauguration day has fallen upon Sunday, which puts the formal ceremony on Monday, the fifth, though the President will take the oath of office privately at the White House on Sunday.

PRESIDENT AND MRS. WILSON—YOU WOULD KNOW THEM ANYWHERE.

The presidential party with Gen. Scott as marshal will leave the White House promptly at eleven o'clock instead of at ten as has been the custom heretofore, for Congress will not be in session and therefore the President will not have to spend the last hour of his old administration in his private office in the Senate side of the Capitol signing belated bills and resolutions passed in the closing hours of Congress.

The President will be escorted by a picked troop of the 2nd. U. S. Cavalry instead of the New Jersey militia regiment of last inauguration. The President made this choice, taking United States Troops in preference to the militia from his own state because his selection of an escort this time was made while he belonged to the Federal Government instead of being a State official or a private citizen.

Vice President Marshall's carriage, drawn by four horses, is to be escorted by the Black Horse Cavalry Troop of Culver Military Institute and the Culver Cadets. Inaugural Chairman Robert N. Harper, whose carriage will come next, with Col. W. W. Harts, the President's aide, and members of the Senate and House Inaugural Committee, will have an escort of mounted hunters.

The great event of the day will be the ceremony at the Capitol conducted much the same as on previous like occasions in recent years. In this case the oath is to be administered by Chief Justice White. Vice President Marshall again takes the oath and delivers his address in the Senate Chamber in the presence of all of the dignitaries and officials of the government and foreign representatives and then the assembly with the President goes to the east portico where the oath is administered to the head of the nation to be followed immediately by the inaugural address. Upon this occasion it is planned to permit the general public to draw near and to see and hear the President give his address at close range instead of having to view this part of the program over the heads and shoulders of the great concourse of military that has heretofore filled all of the space around the stand. The President decided that the military should give place to the people—a radical departure from the methods of bygone days and another niche in his record of precedent smashing. (In the event of present strained relations with Germany becoming more acute it may be deemed prudent to interpose the military as a precaution for the personal safety of the President.—EDITOR.)

Contrary to ancient precepts, both Mrs. Wilson and Mrs. Marshall are to ride in the carriages with their respective husbands. True Mrs. Taft rode with her husband on the return journey from the Capitol, but never before has the wife of a Vice President taken part thus in the triumphant procession. Mrs. Marshall, as everyone knows is the Vice President's campaign partner, for she has traveled with him on all of his campaign tours, as well as every time he has stumped his state and the old wiseacres claim that Mrs. Marshall's tact and knack of winning the friendship of the rural women put many a ballot in the box for her husband.

In planning the arrangement of this parade, the committee sought to work it out as a beautifully balanced picture that would hold its place for all time in the memory of those who should see it. To insure its harmonious blending Inaugural Chairman Harper secured the services of an artist on parades, pageants, etc., and every unit and division was carefully considered and determined from several standpoints so that the whole procession should be perfect from an artistic point of view. Hence the vast display of military that usually predominates in these events was cut down so that the two grand divisions, the military and civic, will bear more evenly balanced proportions. In the military will be seen as usual detachments representing all branches of the army and navy and so placed as to give the spectators a continuous passing picture of the types of the fighting forces of the United States.

In the civic division, also, political clubs, patriotic societies and associations representing various arts, crafts and industries of the nation were shifted about in the planning until just their most appropriate setting was artistically adjusted.

Of all of the notable innovations, that have made their appearance in this pageant the most striking and significantly impressive is the presence of a regular woman's section comprised of several thousand women of all persuasions, sects and beliefs, for it was the boast of Mrs. Boggs, the chairman of this section and the first woman ever to be appointed upon an Inaugural committee, that all women's organizations were welcome, politics and partizanship being submerged in patriotic efforts to demonstrate what women could do. Her escort in similarity to that of Col. Harper is to be an equestrian squadron of Virginia Horsewomen, about three hundred of them dressed in red velvet riding jackets, black velvet skirts and black silk beavers. These women are to precede the automobile with Mrs. James H. Boggs and her officers, and following her will come the District of Columbia Girl Scouts, with their captains in the khaki uniforms and carrying banners describing their activities. To the

Short Cuts in Housecleaning

By Mary Hamilton Talbott

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

THE best way to clean house is to do it gradually through the year. Eliminate dirt as you go along. Never allow things to accumulate but clear them out every month. If this has not been your plan, however, start now and get rid of the impedimenta. You might begin with that shelf of old medicines. Get rid of empty cans and bottles; the half emptied cartons of breakfast foods, crackers and the like on the pantry shelf. Take stock of the clothes and pass on all the outgrown garments and all those which you do not see immediate possibilities for using. Dispose of everything that is only littering up your house. Your work will be cut in two if you get the trash out of the way and you may have the satisfaction, too, of knowing you are providing moths, mice, roaches, and various household pests with fewer breeding places.

There are so many little bits of repair work about the house which can be done to freshen it, and a good time to do it is before one gets busy with the heavier work. If a tile in the bathroom or fireplace is loose, or there is a hole in the wall, mix some plaster of Paris with water, set the tiling or fill in the hole, smooth off the paste with a knife, and in the case of the wall try and match a piece of wall paper over it. You will have taken away much of the shabbiness which such things invariably cause. Perhaps you have a room that you would like to repaper because the paper looks so soiled, but you feel that it must be put off another year because of the expense. Try cleaning the paper yourself with this mixture: A quart of flour, a tablespoonful of bottle bluing, a tablespoonful of alcohol, a level tablespoonful of powdered alum, and enough water to make a stiff batter like bread sponge. Bake it fifteen minutes in an ungreased pan. Pour onto a bread board all that will come out of the pan without any of the brown crust, mix into it finely rolled crackers until it is too stiff to stick to the paper, and using a small piece at a time rub the paper with it—keeping the large lump folded in a damp cloth to prevent drying out too quickly. If you want to clean your painted kitchen walls fill the wash boiler and let the water in it boil until the room is filled with steam, then with a clean cloth wipe down the walls, and you will find them as clean as if you had given yourself a backache trying to scrub them.

Everyone who can possibly do it should have a vacuum cleaner as a help at this time, even if it must be engaged by the hour. It is not only a great strength saver, but saves wear and tear on the house and its furnishings. The rugs are cleaner and they are much less worn than when they are hung over the clothesline and beaten, as so many people still think it necessary to do. One such cleaning by a careless man will often prove more injurious than a year of regular usage. The mattresses, pillows, draperies, books, clothing, can all have the dirt sucked out of them by the appliances which come with a vacuum cleaner. Even a vacuum carpet sweeper, costing very little, will clean your rugs, carpets and floors better than a broom. You will be able, too, to accomplish your work in half the time and you will not be so tired. A vacuum cleaner run by electric power is most desirable for anyone who has electricity in the house, as it can be connected instantly with the light fixture in any room which you wish to clean, but for those who do not have electric lights there are several makes of hand-operated vacuum cleaners which do excellent work.

Manufacturers are vying with each other to make housecleaning easier for the progressive woman. Look at your hands after you have been wringing out a scrub cloth. Of course they are knotted and swollen; besides your work is not as well done as if you had used a scrub-cloth wringer, for you cannot use as hot water or as strong suds with your hands. Get a mop with an adjustable scrubber and scraper and even the small boy will be glad to help you. A very moderate priced helper is a brush for washing windows which does away with danger; it is round, has long, soft bristles, and a rubber binding to protect the glass from an inadvertent blow, while the handle is so curved that all parts of the pane may be washed from the inside of the raised sash. And there is no use in thinking that radiators can be really cleaned with an ordinary brush; the work is better done and in half the time with a brush made specially for the purpose. It is about an inch wide, slightly curved and fitted with soft bristles of graduated lengths, and no crack or crevice can be missed.

A whisk broom will not remove the dust in upholstered furniture satisfactorily; if one brushes hard enough to get down into the folds and small places around the buttons the fabric is invariably roughened. By investing fifty cents you can procure a brush that is made for just this work. At one end of the handle is a sharp-pointed tuft of stiff bristles which easily removes dust from around and under the upholstery buttons, and at the other end is a soft brush which takes it from the folds and will not injure the finest damask. Whatever you do, don't use an old-fashioned back-breaking dustpan, but get one with a long handle; the cover on the pan can be adjusted with the foot and all the work can be done without strain.

White enamel paint requires as careful handling as highly polished furniture and many a woman ruins hers by scrubbing it with soap and water; this fogs it. Use kerosene; one cupful to a gallon of water will remove every bit of dirt and leave it as glossy as when first put on the woodwork. Few people appreciate the cleaning quality of kerosene and there is in many homes an absurd prejudice against using it; yet it is far ahead of soap and water in its cleansing powers. Nothing will more quickly clean the metal trimmings of the bathroom than this oil mixed with whiting. It is also very effective in removing mildew from books which have been closed up in a damp place. Remember kerosene when you come to cleaning your gas stove, it will cut the dirt with but little effort.

Of course everybody washes their lace curtains when they take them down in the spring—and the wise housewife will leave them down until fall, for it seems foolish to re-hang clean curtains only to have them flap against dusty screens. If you want to do this with little labor to yourself and at a great saving to the life of the curtains use a suction washer, which consists of a funnel-shaped cone made of heavy tin, a strong wooden handle and an inside mechanism with an automatic suction valve. There is a lever attached to the handle which is so arranged as to swing the plunger to any part of the tub, or the plunger may be used without the lever. A clamp fits this device to any tub and the soil is removed from the finest fabrics in a short time without injury by the compressed air and suction which forces the water through the clothes. This washer can be used successfully for washing rag rugs and many heavy things which would take much labor without this valuable aid.

A difficult part of housecleaning work is the lifting of heavy mattresses, owing to the awkwardness that makes handling difficult. Your task will be easier if you will sew heavy webbing across the ends of the mattress making a handle of the same at the four corners. This removes the strain from the corners of the ticking which soons wears out if the handles are simply sewed to the corners. An excellent cleaner for mattresses and pillows is a paste made of cornmeal and gasoline. Remember that no heat, not even a lighted lamp or candle, must come near them until the gasoline is thoroughly evaporated. This cleaning should be done outdoors and the mattresses left out until thoroughly dry and aired.

You will save yourself an endless litter of dirty cloths if you use sponges—the close, solid kind, costing ten cents each, keeping one for soapy water and one for rinsing. And do not think dustless dusters an extravagance. They are a most wonderful labor saver, and they make a cleaner place than the old-time cloth for dusting. Dustless mops for the floor save many a backache, reaching as they do the farthermost corners under the radiators, heavy bookcases and tables for elusive dust which otherwise the housewife would have to get down on her knees to find. These mops range in price from seventy-five cents to a dollar and a half. With the vegetable oil which is used on them, they mean clean and bright floors with a minimum of work. These mops can be washed, when dirty, in hot water and washing soda and no woman with a bare floor should be without one.

I heard a woman say recently, "If housecleaning could just get one somewhere besides just cleaning, it would be more interesting, the mere digging for dirt is so tiresome." Make your housecleaning yield a little something toward the completion of the home. Rearrange the furniture, adjust the color scheme; if something is a trifle out of harmony, cover it, dye it, bleach it. Make this season count in more ways than one. The influence will be noticeable even on the children; every member of the house will take an interest in your work and let them have a voice in the rearrangement of furnishings. You may be sure the man of the house will not "take to the tall timber" when you mention housecleaning time if you consult him about things and have on a pretty frock in the evening when he comes home; he will be buying you all sorts of labor-savers when he knows how they help you. Whenever a man works he demands the best kind of tools, for modern efficiency methods show him the necessity for them. So should every housewife have the best obtainable equipment.

Comfort's League of Cousins

again and see if I don't succeed this time. My father owns two hundred and sixty-five acres of land, eighty of which we ourselves farm, renting the other two places. So you see I am a country girl and can do most all kinds of housework, though I do believe I love to read better than anything. And flowers, oh, don't you think the homes with their green lawns and flowers are beautiful? It seems to me more homey and happy to be surrounded by flowers. I plant flowers all over our place wherever they will grow, and build bird houses for the birds to come and live in. I am eighteen years old, weigh about one hundred and twenty-five pounds, five feet five inches in height, dark brown hair and eyes and a dark clear complexion, and am a deaf lip reader. But I don't mind. I have lots of fun, and take long auto rides that's such sport.

It's pitiful to think of the invalids who can never leave their beds of pain. I would be pleased to hear from anyone, especially those who are deaf, but from any and all I would be glad to hear. With love to all,

Your niece, ANNA PETERSEN. (League No. 41,985.)

Here is a little girl who builds houses for the birds she loves and yet is doomed never to hear their song. She can see her little feathered friends, but she cannot hear them express their gratitude by those glorious trills of melody that no human song bird can equal. I wonder how many of you have followed the example of Anna Petersen? I recently received a letter from a friend of mine who lives in Fort Wayne, and who drives the Flier between that city and Chicago. In his home in the suburbs of the city in which he resides, he has turned his garden into a bird paradise, and he is having the time of his life and so are the birds, who come to visit him from the four corners of birdland. He has a beautiful fountain where they drink, bathe and sport, and he has built wonderfully artistic bird houses, which have all the modern conveniences, like millionaire apartment houses. All the lucky birds who live in this bird oasis, tell their bird friends of their good luck, and any time there is a bird meeting in any section of the globe the name of William Jungles is greeted with three cheers, I mean three chirps. Brother Jungles tells me that strange, beautiful birds, that have not been seen in his section of the country for an age, now take up their residence in his bird hotels during the entire summer. He says it is wonderfully interesting and fascinating to watch the antics of his feathered friends in the modern Garden of Eden he has provided for them. For him they save their sweetest songs, and when he scatters food around they swarm about him as though he were one of their own kind. The bird house idea is spreading like wildfire all over the land. Even the boys in the cities are erecting bird houses in their back yards, when they have any—and it's about time. Bird life is rapidly becoming extinct, and think what a dreary world this would be without the birds, those graceful, happy, wonderful little creatures, who do so much to brighten the countryside. Of course there are bad birds as well as good birds, just as there are bad humans as well as good humans, but birds as a class are one of man's very best friends. There is a terrific warfare always going on for supremacy on this planet. That fight isn't between the Central Powers and the Allies or Uncle Sam and Japan, but between mankind and the insect pests which are forever striving to eat him out of house and home and drive him off the planet. In this terrific contest, which is rapidly becoming acute, the birds are our best friends, and without their aid we would have lost the fight long ago and been starved out of existence. A bird can eat its own weight in insects in a very brief period. Scientists are not guessing when they tell us this, for they have been simply astounded when they have opened the stomachs of birds and discovered whole armies of insects safely tucked away in birdy's capacious bug digester. Start your bird houses right away, and see what pleasure and delight they will bring you. It does not take much ingenuity or skill to build them, and they will repay your efforts a thousandfold. Anna dear, I am sorry that you are deaf, but how much luckier to be deaf than blind. Maybe that's poor consolation, but still it is a consolation. People often pity and sympathize with me, but when I think of the many who are incapable of using either hand or brain I consider myself very lucky. Anna doubtless does the same. Send her lots of letters. It is such as she who will appreciate them and the kind thought they will contain.

SAN DIEGO, 830 8th St., CAL.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I have recently returned from Mexico and San Blas. While there it was against the war rules to send out any private items of news in regard to methods of how the soldiers and officers conducted it. But I am now in U. S. A. again and will write you facts that came under my own observation while living over two years in Tepic, Mexico. On the morning of March 12th last, within two blocks of my house lived an English gentleman, who carried on a repair shop and had one small gasoline motor engine to furnish him with power to do such work as came into his shop from time to time. He often had automobiles to repair. On this morning in question, at about six o'clock, creada (cook woman) as is the custom there, went out to market with a small basket to buy some meat and vegetables for the day's meals, and left the front doors unlocked. The proprietor of the house and his woman housekeeper had not arisen, it being Sunday. Twelve of Carranza's soldiers entered the house at this open door and closed it behind them, while the creada was at the market, and cut the throat of the Englishman from ear to ear, and stabbed his body in fifteen places, and then stuffed sawdust in the housekeeper's throat and mouth, after they had cut her throat. Then when the creada returned they also cut her throat and stuffed sawdust in her mouth. Then they looted the boxes and trunks in the house, carrying away much of the personal effects. A little nephew of the housekeeper called about half hour after these murders had been committed, to see his auntie. He discovered the bloody bodies lying about on the floors, and rushed out to the neighbors to tell them what he had seen. Neighbors went in and found the dead and then gave the alarm and went to the governor and told him of it. He sent some officers to the house and found it all true. Then he set them at work to ferret out the murderers, and to the dealers in the town who usually bought all stolen goods. Soon the officers had the information required, they had the dealers go with them and locate each man who was implicated in this affair and arrested all of them and placed them in the penitentiary for examination. One of the guilty parties was captain of the company the men were members of at that time. The governor placed all of them under rigid examination, and all confessed their part in the murders. Some were put through the third degree when refusing testimony, which in that country is tying a man's thumbs to a sling and raising his body above the floor, till he tells the truth, and other methods. The governor published that a public execution would be celebrated in five days after the murders were committed, and in front of the church and the public plaza. On Friday of the same week, six of the condemned soldiers were marched handcuffed to the place announced, where hundreds of the people had gathered, filling the house tops and all places to look at the execution. At that time I was near to them and saw the six shot dead. The bullets still remain in the blocks of stone. On the following day the captain was shot at the same place and the other five in the penitentiary. So all were executed.

I saw the dried up bodies of road robbers hanging by the necks on trees for weeks, to fall down of themselves, the flesh carried away by buzzards and vultures, but no person was permitted to take them down. I will answer all the cousins' letters who wish to know more about Mexico. I remain your COMFORT cousin and nephew, WM. H. BRIGGS.

Bill, I'm glad to know that Villa didn't get you. You must be about the only American living that he did not get. I think you have been wise to get out of Mexico. I've never been in hell, but I should imagine that hell must be a pleasant place compared with Mexico. I know I would rather take a chance in the latter than the former. After reading your letter William, I've come to the conclusion that there is hope for Mexico. I'm sorry you did not give me that governor's name. I would have liked to have written him a letter thanking him for the prompt way in which he punished the fiends who murdered the Englishman and his housekeeper. If that murder had taken place in the United States, the odds are the murderers would never have been caught, and if they had been caught, never brought to trial. If one of our typical fool juries didn't acquit them, it is dollars to doughnuts some shyster lawyer would have got them off scot free on a technicality. I want to take my hat off to the governor of Tepic Territory, Mexico. I don't know the gentleman's name, but if I had it I certainly would write and congratulate him on the drastic and speedy way in which he avenged the death of that man and his housekeeper. I suppose if it had been an American instead of an Englishman he would not have bothered. Every Mexican has a wholesome dread of John Bull, who protects his citizens no matter where they go, and a whole hearted contempt for Uncle Sam, who permits his citizens to be murdered by the thousands abroad, and the tens of thousands at home. Oh, I forgot Uncle Sam is a great hand at boxing the ears of little Hayti or Nicaragua when they start cutting up Americans, but the old gentleman sings mighty small when Mexico or any of the big powers go on a rampage and murder, slay and drown those born under the Stars and Stripes—citizens it is the old gentleman's business to protect. Well we can't blame Uncle Sam when we have a navy only half manned, an army of three men and a dog, a national guard largely composed of department store clerks and office boys, many of whom, though brave and patriotic, don't know a gun from a hole in the ground. With such defenses as these the old gentleman can't throw many bluffs without making himself ridiculous. But that's not the point just now. What I want to get hold of is the Governor of Tepic, Mexico. That man would be a godsend to the United States. If we were to turn him loose on our criminal hordes, instead of a thousand murders a month we should not have one murder in ten years. I admire a man of action, a man who gets right on the job at the drop of the hat, a man who sizes up a situation instantly and gets busy right on the jump. A man of that kind may make an occasional mistake, but he does succeed in putting the fear of God into the hearts of the lawless, and he does get results, and the right kind of results, and that is something the dickering, paltering, higgling, pussy footing, side stepping, undecided, scared to act man, never does. In Britain they had a nice, respectable old gentleman for premier, named Asquith, a dithering gentleman who for two years has been telling the British people to "wait and see." The British people took Asquith's advice, they have waited and seen, and seen little but misfortune and bad luck. Now they have got a little man of action named Lloyd George, who has the ability to get things done, and if he does not get results it will be because the old "wait and see" gentleman waited so darned long that it was too late to get any results. It is a long time since I wrote an article about Mexico and for obvious reasons. This country is divided into two camps on the Mexican question, and each side violently asserts that the other fellows' ideas of solving the Mexican problem are all wrong. On the one hand we have those who think we should go in and clean the place up and do for it what we did for Cuba and the Philippines, while the others want to "wait and see," want it left to its own devices (spell it d—vices please Mr. Printer). A perfectly good case can be made out for either side. We would not want anyone butting into our affairs if we had an internal squabble, as we had in 1863. But there is a difference. The world knew that after that little racket was straightened out, orderly government would resume its sway, as we had demonstrated our capacity for self government, which is something the Mexican people have never done and are not likely to do with the crude human material they have down there. Don't forget that of Mexico's fifteen million people, thirteen million are wholly or partly Indian. In the city if you have a riotous neighbor that disturbs your peace of mind and breaks down your health by his objectionable, uncivilized methods of living, you call in the police or the Board of Health, and that gentleman is forced to keep the peace, and is not left to do as he pleases and become a festering social sore. If Mexico cannot clean up and behave herself, cannot select some man able to restore peace, law and order, somebody will simply have to go in there and do for the Mexicans what they are incapable for the present at least, of doing for themselves. We cannot have eighteen hundred miles of our border continually menaced by raiding hordes of cutthroats, and the world cannot afford to have one of its richest and most productive sections converted into a barren waste by political brigands whose one and only ambition is to grab the few bits of loot the other brigands have not yet appropriated. I believe Carranza is a good man and sincere, though many say he is not. His whiskers make him look wise, patriarchal and venerable, and whiskers wisely used have a distinct psychological value in impressing the ignorant. I wish to God Carranza could bring order out of chaos and bring peace and prosperity to his unhappy country. I do not however believe he can do it, nor do I believe any other Mexican can do it, unless Uncle Sam is right at his back to help him do the job with men and money, and guns if necessary, and the Yankee school mistress is also on the job, getting in her fine, enlightening work, just as she is doing in the Philippines. We ourselves make but a sorry spectacle in our attempts to govern ourselves along democratic lines, so what can we expect of Mexico which is about eighty-five per cent Indian? I only wish Mexico would invite us to send some of our best men to help them try and straighten out their tangled affairs. But they are hot headed and proud, and too ignorant to act broadly and wisely. Then too, so many tens of thousands have tasted the sweets of brigandage and adventure that few of them would care to go back to the old prosaic ways of toiling hard for a living. They find fascinating sport in outraging women and swiping other people's property. Anyway the governor of Tepic has got the right idea of handling murderous Mexicans and I wish to heaven Congress would hire him to come up here and try his efficient hand at handling murderous Americans. We have the highest murder record on the face of the earth. The brand of Cain is on the nation's brow. Let us get the governor of Tepic to come up here and remove it. God knows it is time it was removed.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a little farmer girl, four feet seven inches tall, blue eyes, light hair, and thirteen years old, and in the eighth grade in school.

My father owns a good-sized farm with an eight-roomed house and a large barn. And say, I forgot we've got two black dogs, one Dr. Orlo and the other his wife Lizzie anyway that's what we call them.

I have got three sisters and one brother.

I have not done my housework yet. I have got a little history, a little grammar and a little literature and I hope I have not made so many mistakes and said so many funny things as some of the cousins do.

Many children and "stuck ups" live up around here and say Uncle Charlie have the people where you live got any shoestrings (or whatever you call them) tied around their foreheads? Honestly it seems

That Freckled Nose

THE time of freckles is approaching, when we can scarcely poke our noses out of doors without old Sol turning his burning glass upon us and producing a sprinkling of objectionable brown spots which we later sigh over before our mirrors.

Of course all my girls will be writing me: "Oh, what shall I do for freckles?" as I am taking Time by the forelock and telling all of you right now, girls, that the best way to get rid of freckles is not to have them! Freckles are really very hard to remove, for they are spots of pigment beneath the skin, and the skin has to be peeled off to dispose of them. After that is done, the new skin is sensitive and, of course, apt to freckle easily, so with one crop just out of the way, another may follow close on its heels.

You want to start in the early spring to prevent any freckles appearing. To do this, you must protect the skin from the glaring sun or intense heat. Never wear a narrow-brimmed hat or go bareheaded in the summer-time. Neither is a lace hat any protection, for the sun beats right through. Therefore, if you value a freckleless nose, choose large hats. If you go motoring, and a big hat is not feasible, wear a motoring bonnet with a visor or front brim, and a large chiffon veil.

At all times rub all the cold cream your skin will absorb into your face before going outdoors (and it will take a lot, if well rubbed in). Wipe softly with a pad of absorbent cotton, then dust generously with powder, and go over skin softly again with a fresh cotton pad. By the way, keep a bag or glass jar of cotton pads on your dresser.

If you swim, there is little hope of escaping freckles, although some of the wide-brimmed bathing hats which fit close down around the head and shade face and neck, help a little. Be careful to use quantities of cold cream and powder before going into the water and immediately after coming out.

The moment a freckle appears, mix some glycerine and lemon juice, half and half, and bathe the entire face with it, at night, letting it dry in. Keep up every night until the outer skin begins to peel off in little flakes. Then stop and rub in cold cream.

For severe freckles, rub lemon juice into a tablespoonful of dry mustard, then add a teaspoonful of oil of sweet almonds. Use a new mucilage brush or small paint brush and dab the paste on each freckle at night. The skin will soon begin to feel warm, then wash off face and rub in some cold cream. Keep up for a few days, and the skin will peel off exactly as if you had been sunburned. If you leave the paste on too long it will raise blisters or leave a scar. Be careful, also, not to get it in or near the eyes; and wash it off very thoroughly before using the cold cream.

If you have been exposed to a very hot sun, and fear your skin has suffered damage, a good idea, the moment you reach home, is to get a pitcher or bowl of very hot water and four Turkish wash-cloths. Put all the four cloths in the hot water. Lie down, wring out one cloth and fold over upper part of face to tip of nose, pressing down clear to nose. Wring out a second cloth, and fold over lower part of face just below nostrils. As soon as these begin to cool, replace with the two hot cloths and put the first ones to soak again. Keep getting fresh hot water as fast as it cools at all. Keep this up for fifteen to twenty minutes, and it will usually prevent sunburn, tan or freckles from the overexposure you have just suffered. This treatment must, of course, be taken the moment you come in from being in the sun.

Answers to Questions

B. B. S.—You can gain in weight by eating the kinds of foods that produce fat—potatoes, boiled or baked but not fried, rice, macaroni, white bread and butter, cereals with plenty of cream, and by drinking milk. Eat only at meals, and chew your food thoroughly, get lots of outdoor exercise, and plenty of sleep, and of course always have fresh air in your room at night. See that the eliminative functions of the body are in order daily; you can help this by following the advice I am constantly giving—to drink eight to ten glasses of water daily. In the last issue of COMFORT, I gave directions to one of our Pretty Girls about caring for her nails—follow those directions, and you will be surprised at how good-looking your nails will become.

Marie.—For the bad case of dandruff, shampoo the head at once, first going over the entire scalp with olive oil the night before and tying the head up in a towel to avoid soiling the bed-clothes. When you shampoo the next day, following the directions given so many times in these columns, the oil will help to rid the scalp of dandruff. Thereafter, you must not only be careful to wash it once in three weeks, but you must brush the hair gently every night before going to bed, one hundred strokes, and you must on no account go to bed with it done up. Either let it hang loose, or braid it very loosely indeed. Do not put water on the hair when brushing it, ever. Look to your general health, for if you are under weight and not very strong, your hair is being affected by your general condition. Make up your mind to get plenty of sleep, to eat sensible foods, to drink quantities of water, and to cut out coffee and tea—not more than one cup a day, should you drink for the time being.

Mrs. W. W. T.—The Vaucaire bust tonic is harmless. The formula is as follows:

To Develop the Bust

Liquid extract of galega (goat's rue), ten grams; lacto-phosphate of lime, ten grams; tincture of fennel, ten grams; simple syrup, one hundred grams.

Be sure that you use a reliable druggist, so that the galega is perfectly fresh. The amount to use is two soupspoonfuls in water before every meal. I think a better plan is to exercise—any arm exercises—and to look to the general health. Gentle massage will do a great deal for the bust. Rub around and around, following the outline of the bust, and being very careful not to press too firmly.

Pansy.—You could afford to weigh fifteen or twenty pounds more, since you are five feet eight and one half inches tall; yet, if your bones are small, your present weight of one hundred and thirty is not very bad. As to your slim bust, if you are only nineteen, that will probably fill out. You can assist it to do so by exercising daily—all the arm exercises so frequently given in these columns. There are pulley exercises which fasten to the wall which are excellent to develop the chest and arms—which, in turn, produces a larger bust. Swimming or rowing or tennis or other active outdoor sports help to develop the upper part of the figure, besides being excellent for the general health. The milk diet would add pounds to your weight and without doubt increase your bust measurement, as well, in three or four weeks. The pores of the skin on the nose are full of white matter because your skin is evidently sluggish and is not sufficiently stimulated to throw off the secretions. Be sure to take a complete body bath daily, and rub the skin briskly—the face with a soft towel, the rest of the body with the ordinary Turkish bath towel. This incites the little pores to do their duty. Invest, also, in a complexion brush, camel's hair—and use it to scrub the face every night. That is all your facial skin needs.

V. S.—I do not quite understand how you have been using the peroxide. You say you put it on "one night and a cloth wet." Do you mean you wet a cloth with it and laid it over the skin? Just dampen the hairy spot with the peroxide one night, and with ammonia the next night. You say your skin is turning yellow—perhaps you have been using too much peroxide, though that would ordinarily bleach the skin. Probably the reason for the yellowness of the skin lies in what you have been eating—perhaps too many sweets, too much butter or fat meat. Cut down a little on sweets for a time, take the juice of half a lemon in a glass of cool water half an hour before breakfast, and eat grapefruit or oranges every morning for breakfast. Then drink plenty of water, and take some of the exercises for the bowels which I have given in these columns. I think you will find the yellow skin promptly disappear.

Mrs. C. T. S.—I am sorry it is against the rules of this department to answer letters by mail, or I should have been glad to write you. If you are only five feet two inches high, one hundred and ninety-five pounds is almost seventy pounds too much. You have some work ahead of you! The first thing you should do is to alter your diet, for nothing in the world can reduce you while you are eating any foods that produce fat. Therefore you must cut out sweet things, starchy things, fat things; this means that you must not eat potatoes, rice, macaroni, cereals, cream, milk, butter, bacon, salt pork, or other fat meat, gravy, puddings, cakes, candies, preserves, etc. You think, I presume, that this sounds dreadfully hard, but it isn't for there are plenty of foods that you can eat. For instance, for breakfast you can eat a grapefruit or an orange, some soft-boiled eggs or some salt fish (broiled mackerel, for instance, but not creamed codfish, because you must avoid the foods which are cooked with cream sauces.) You can eat, for dinner, lean meat of any kind, spinach, string beans, peas, onions, celery, lettuce, asparagus, turnips, cabbage (either boiled or as cold slaw), cauliflower, etc. You must put scarcely any butter in your vegetables. Avoid soups, and do not drink at your meals. You can eat, for dessert, sliced or shredded pineapple, sliced oranges, grapes, melons, any of the berries (without cream or sugar), but nothing sweet. If you will stick to this diet (cutting out breads) for a few weeks, you will find, on weighing at the end of that time, that you have lost several pounds. You must not eat between meals, and should eat only three times a day and at regular hours. The Epsom salts reducing paste can be used in addition. To make this, take half a pound of Epsom salts and dissolve in a pint of rain-water. Shave one and a half bars of white kitchen soap and add to a quart of boiling water on the stove. Let stand over the flame until entirely dissolved. Then, partially cool, and beat in the Epsom salts solution. Massage into the portions of the body you desire to reduce, at night, and let dry in. In the morning, wash off with tepid water, then dash on cold water. You should take exercise every day of your life—fifteen minutes of bedroom exercises in your nightgown or kimono, then at least half an hour outdoors every day.

Mrs. F. R.—See answer to Mrs. C. T. S. about personal letters. I am glad you are taking the milk diet. You are drinking the right amount, and while it does, of course, make you feel "full," that is the way to produce results. For your height, five feet four, one hundred and thirty-five pounds would not be too much to weigh. Stick to the diet, and let me know how you get along.

Miss E. Z.—The way to fill out your neck is to build up your entire body, for you weigh forty-five pounds too little! Start right in to build up, and soon your neck will take care of itself. If you would go on the milk diet, according to the directions so often printed in these columns, you could add from one to three pounds in weight each week. The reason you get constipated and "sick at your stomach" when you are drinking milk is, first, because you are probably taking it along with solid food, and, second, because your stomach is out of order and needs to be "sick" before it gets well. Just drop all solid food for a time. (I would be willing to wager that you have been eating lots of ham and salt pork and other salt meats, very little fruit, and plenty of constipating vegetables like potatoes.) Drink a glass and a half of milk (cool, not cold) every hour for eight times a day, chewing each mouthful before swallowing, the object of this being to mix the saliva with it and so help digest it before it reaches the stomach. Drink two glasses of hot water on rising and fifteen minutes later eat half a dozen prunes that have been soaked in a tumbler of water over night. Drink the prune juice also. Twenty minutes later begin your milk. Between your last "dose" at night and going to bed drink two glasses of hot water, at the same time putting the prunes to soak. If your bowels do not move freely, take a little lapactic pill (you can buy a small bottle from your druggist for thirty-five or fifty cents) at night, and if you take the prunes as directed, the water, and "chew" the milk, I do not think you will have any trouble. For two days before you start on the milk diet, drink eight to ten glasses of water a day, and eat no meat or potatoes; eat, instead, fruit, such as oranges or grapefruit, vegetables such as string beans, peas, asparagus, onions, spinach and take soup. Stop all coffee and tea, and drink nothing with your meals those two days. Take a lapactic pill the night before you begin on the milk diet. I shall be interested to know how rapidly you gain. When you are through with the milk diet, be careful of your food. You should eat fat-building foods—for breakfast, cereals and cream, fresh fruit, soft-boiled eggs. You can eat baked apples or baked pears instead of fresh fruits; or you can always eat raw apples. For your dinner you can get eat baked or boiled potatoes, any vegetables you want, especially those fixed with a creamed sauce, and you can eat any roasted or broiled fresh meat, although pork and veal are hard to digest. Fish is good for you, eggs in any form so long as they are not hard. Eat plenty of bread, cream or everything that will take cream, and do not drink tea or coffee. In addition, remember to drink eight to ten glasses of water a day, between meals but not at the table. Chew every particle of food until it is fluid before swallowing.

Miss S. McG.—The peroxide and ammonia treatment for superfluous hair is good—dampen one day with peroxide, the next with ammonia. It takes quite a long time, but the peroxide bleaches the hair and the ammonia, in time, kills the roots and the hair will dry up and fall out.

Paden City.—My, but you have a lot of problems, haven't you? but some of them I should not worry about. You say you have used soda in the water with which you shampooed your hair, and it has turned it light, while eyebrows and eyes are black, and you are chagrined! Well, stop using the soda, and brush the hair religiously every night for one hundred strokes to encourage the little cells to do their work well. In time your hair will probably acquire a little darker color. Do not attempt to dye it—you would be just as discouraged over that result as you are over having taken somebody's advice as to how to make it fluffy. To remove pimples, you must see that the bowels move very freely at least once a day. Make a habit of attempting this every morning before breakfast or half an hour afterward, and every night just before going to bed. Never fail to try, and in time you will form a habit. Stop eating sweets, candies, cakes, pies and rich desserts and gravies. Eat plenty of fruits and drink eight to ten glasses of water a day. The way to get rid of a pimple is through the stomach! To make the eyelashes long, keep the body in good condition so the blood is rich and the hair is well nourished. Then anoint the lids—just the very edge—at night, with warm olive oil. To make your cheeks red, do the same things I tell you for getting rid of pimples, and in addition exercise fifteen minutes night and morning in your bedroom, and get at least a half-hour's walk each day, just as brisk as can be, and, besides, play tennis, basket ball, swim, row, or do any other athletic thing that is possible. Sleep with your window thrown as high as it will go. You can't change the size of your eyes, my dear, but you can make them clear and healthy looking by following the above advice, and that makes them seem larger. Your liver spot is probably the result of eating too many sweets, too much fat meat. It will yield to the same treatment as the pimples. See my breakfast suggestions to "V. S." The Persians call eyebrows which meet, "the bridge of love," considering them most beautiful, but if you do not like yours, get a pair of tweezers at the druggist's, and pull them out carefully one by one. Catch with the tweezers close to the roots. They will come back and you have to do this over again every little while. "A clear smooth complexion?" You get this by the same route which disposes of pimples and liver spots! Take a body bath daily, of course, and rub the skin well. Use soapy water on the face only at night, and always rinse it off many times. In the daytime, use tepid water, and dash cold water on at last to close the pores. You can keep small bags, about two inches by three, half filled with rolled oats, and made of cheese-cloth, on your dresser, and use one of these as a washcloth in the daytime, taking a fresh one every day. Dip it quickly in the water, then wash the face with it. It will leave a little powdery substance on the face; pat the skin dry but do not rub. This cleanses as well as soap, and does not roughen the skin but leaves it white and smooth. You want your hair to be curly "in front?" Well, you might do it up on kid curlers at night. But plain hair is very fashionable at present, and if you shampoo your hair once in two or three weeks, and brush it every night as I have directed, it will soon look nicely worn plain. As for freckles, here is a formula to use, which is simple and cheap, as you request: Three tablespoonfuls of lemon juice and three of glycerine. Shake together, and every night dampen freckles with it, letting it dry on.

Trees That Kill, Trees That Rain and Trees That Produce Bread and Butter

By C. L. Chapman

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

AN Australian naturalist has recently found some interesting facts concerning the really marvelous eccentricities of different trees in distant lands: in the West Indies, the Canary Islands, in Arabia, and in the Island of Madagascar.

On one of the Canary Islands there is a tree which dispels from its branches actual rain to such an extent that a cistern placed at its base is never unfilled. This tree grows on one of the driest islands, through which no water ever flows. The branches of the trees are a cloud that changes into moisture frequently and sheds clear water.

In Arabia there is the insane or historical tree, so named from the fact that all who eat of its seeds are affected as if they had taken an overdose of laughing gas. It is not a large tree, seldom growing over six feet high. The seeds have a sweet, sickish taste and a decidedly unpleasant odor. As soon, however, as they have been pounded up and swallowed the user shows an extreme hilarity along with wild dancing, singing, and utter extravagance of language and motion. It is claimed that no other drug in the world has a similar effect.

In contrast with this silly tree is the ferocious man-eating tree of Madagascar. It is from seven to ten feet high and something like a grape fruit in shape, with rough, ugly tendrils stretching out in all directions. The trunk is black and hard as stone.

At the top of the tree are six palpi, six feet high, that rear straight up and twine and hurl about incessantly. There is a cup also at the top which contains a clear, appetizing fluid. But alas for him who drinks it. He becomes peculiarly crazed and unable to get down. Then it is that the whirling palpi twine themselves slowly but surely about the helpless man until life is gone. This species of tree is naturally avoided as a deadly serpent would be, and the natives consider that it is actually alive and possessed of an evil and terrible spirit.

In South America there is a most convenient milk-producing tree which the natives take advantage for the feeding of their children. By boing a hole in its trunk a clear sweet cream emerges which is both healthful and delicious.

In the same class with this practical tree is one in Africa which produces an excellent butter and another one in Ceylon which gives forth bread. This bread is in the form of a fruit—which when baked, is cut and eaten like our own bread. It has a somewhat similar taste.

A little different in variety of prduct, but just as useful is a tree in the West Indies, the bark of which resembles an exquisite filmy lace. It can be stretched out and is worn by native women of fashion and position.

In Guinea there is another tree which yields a peculiar kind of fruit—a huge fruit resembling cannon balls in size and shape and which makes a trembling noise when it pops.

Perhaps the most productive of all trees is the caramba tree, similar to the palm which flourishes along the Rio Grande. When it is young it produces vinegar, while the roots have a taste somethink like sarsaparilla. The trunk gives out a fiber and also a flower. The branches give forth nuts which when roasted can be used as coffee. The wood of the tree is serviceable to make musical instruments. Lastly there is a wax extracted from it that is used to make candles.

Exquisite Beauty Easy to Attain

By Miss Valeska Suratt

The Charming Actress Whose Self-Made Beauty has Become World Famous

BEAUTY never before thought possible is within the reach of thousands of women who will take the trouble to use the formulas I give here. It is necessary for the user to mix the formulas herself—in this way she is certain of results and knows she is obtaining the proper materials.

Wrinkles

A difference of ten years in appearance may be produced in a short time with pleasing results, on deep wrinkles, furrows, light wrinkles, crow's feet, and lines of age, giving a girlish freshness, even in women of middle age and past. Get two ounces of eptol from your druggist: it will cost about fifty cents. Mix with half pint of water and two tablespoonfuls of glycerine. It will not grow hair.

A Lily-Pure Complexion

Instead of spending months using cosmetics trying to beautify your skin, use the following formula, and every freckle, red spot, blemish and muddiness will soon give way to pinky-whiteness and purity that rival the petals of a rose. Get one ounce of zintone from your druggist, it will cost about fifty cents—mix with a pint of water and two tablespoonfuls of glycerine and apply as a cream.

To Obtain Beautiful Hair

"I am proud to say I am known as the only woman on the American stage who wears no switches, puffs, wool rolls or other make-shifts. You may have a wealth of hair, too, if you will get one ounce of beta-quinol from your druggist, costing not more than fifty cents, and mix it with eight ounces of alcohol and eight ounces of water or with a pint of bay rum instead of the water and alcohol. It forces hair to grow in a remarkable way, stops hair from falling.

Healthy Scalp Necessary

While using the hair grower mentioned, you should use also a shampoo made up of a teaspoonful of eggol dissolved in half a cup of water. You can get eggol at any good drug store for twenty-five cents. It is a wonder in eradicating dandruff and cleansing the scalp from every particle of scurf. This lets the roots breathe and gives them renewed life.

Treatment of Superfluous Hair

There is nothing which will remove superfluous hair so perfectly, so magically as sulfo solution. It can be obtained at drug stores for one dollar. It simply dissolves the hair, never irritates, reddens, spots or injures the skin. It can be used on tenderest skin, no matter how stiff or soft the hair growth on any part of the body. Many women have "down" on their faces or arms. Removed with this solution the difference in appearance will be startling.

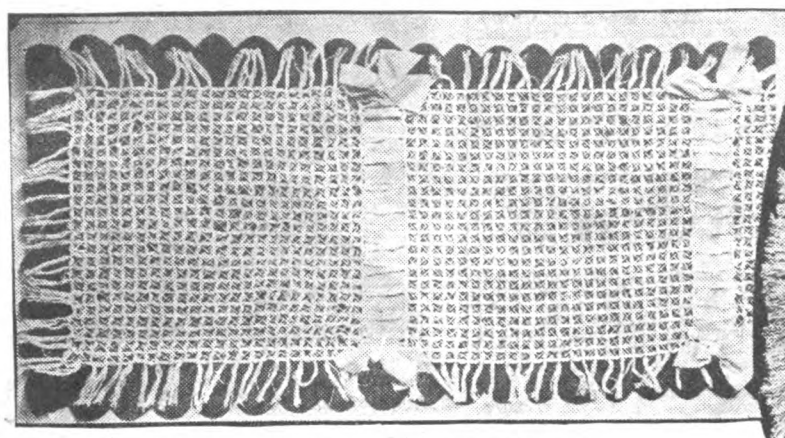
For Blackheads

You can get rid of blackheads in a few minutes by sprinkling some neroxin on a sponge made wet with hot water and rubbing the face with it. It is the only real blackhead remover I ever used. Neroxin will cost you fifty cents at the drug store.

Unusual Face Powder

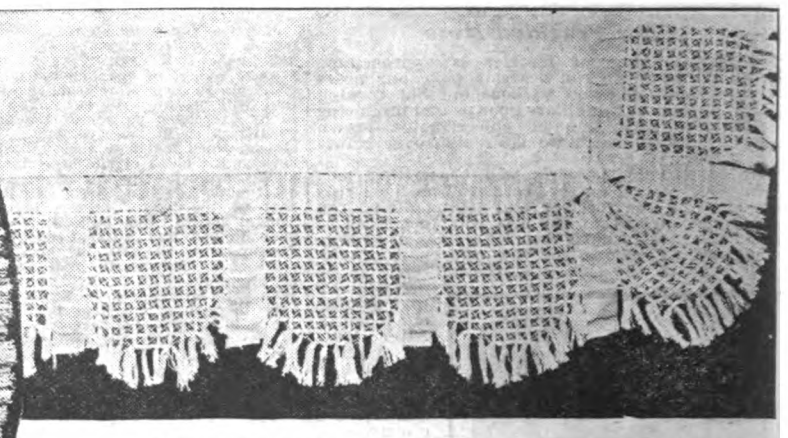
There is much complaint about face powders being much too chalky. That is why I had a powder made after my own formula, called "Valeska Suratt Face Powder." It is the utmost in powder loveliness exquisite in fineness and smoothness, delicate in scent, free from chalkiness, and practically invisible. It is now obtainable in drug and department stores for fifty cents in white, flesh and brunette tints.

Armpit Perspiration



You can at once relieve that excessive and unnatural armpit perspiration by the simple use of hydrolized talc. You can obtain this at any drug store for fifty cents. It will at once remove all odor of perspiration and other body odors and prevent the soppy condition under the arms. It will save you from embarrassment and save your garments as well.

A Beautiful "Movie" Pillow-Top



There has been such a tremendous demand for the elegant "Valeska Suratt Pillow-Tops", beautifully done in orange and purple, with my large photo and signature in the center,—that I have made special arrangements to have my friends supplied with these at the special price of fifty cents each. Send the price to "Secretary to Valeska Suratt", 441 Thompson Bldg., Chicago, and the pillow-top will be mailed to you at once.

Miss Suratt has instructed her secretary to obtain for you any article mentioned above and necessary for making up any of her beauty formulas, if for any reason you have any difficulty or delay in getting them from any drug or department store. In such case simply send your name and address with the price to "Secretary to Valeska Suratt", Suite 441 Thompson Bldg., Chicago, mentioning the articles you want.

New Ideas for the Household in Tatting

DRESSER SCARF OF THREE WOVEN SQUARES.
By Alma Little. Fig. 1.

LINEN BUREAU COVER EDGED WITH WOVEN SQUARES.
By Mrs. E. S. Foster. Fig. 2.

Handwork for Household Linens

OUR columns this month are devoted especially to various sorts of handwork for decorating articles for household use.

Table Linen

It is very satisfactory to make dainty covers for any table as dark wood shows up so prettily under lace or eyelet work.

The set for a dining table sent in by Mrs. Winsor is of sheeting linen and looks very choice and pretty even if not elaborately embroidered. This was designed especially for use during the summer months, to save laundry. The large doily practically covers the top of the table and instead of being finished with the usual scallop, has a simple filet edge made as follows.

Filet Edging

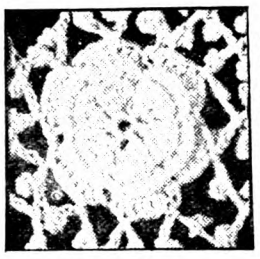
Single crochet closely into the linen, being careful to keep the circles as true as possible.

2nd row.—Ch. 6, 1 d. c. in 3rd st., ch. 3, 1 d. c. in next 3rd st., join by slip st. at end of row. Be sure to make an even number of spaces in each first row.

3rd row.—Ch. 6, 1 d. c. on d. c., ch. 3, 1 d. c. on next, repeat, join.

4th row.—Ch. 6, 1 d. c., ch. 3, 1 d. c. sl. st. over 2 spaces, ch. 6, 1 d. c. ch. 3, 1 d. c., sl. st. over 2 spaces, repeat.

5th row.—8 s. c. in each of the spaces which form the squares on the edge and 3 s. c. in of the spaces between.

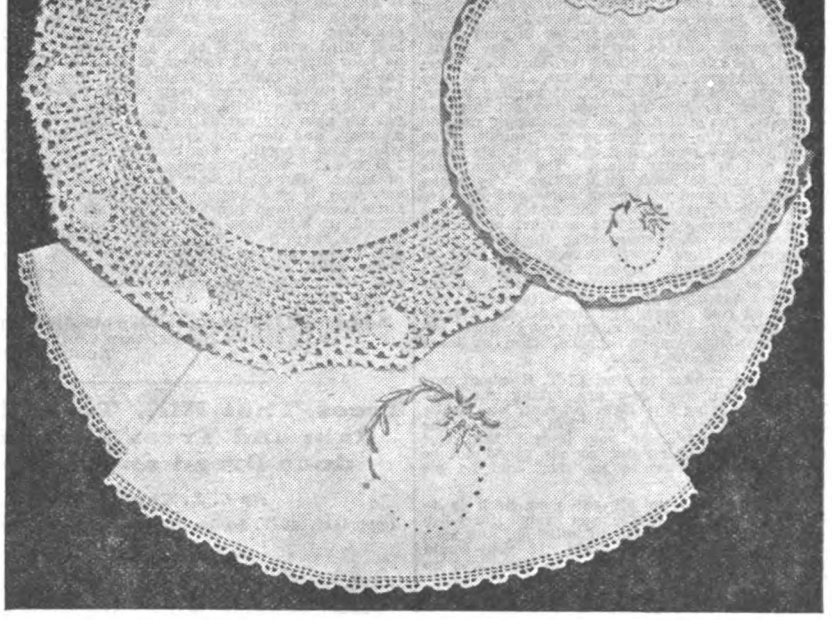


Irish Lace Centerpiece

BY MRS. NUTTING.

Single crochet closely around the edge of linen center, join.

1st row.—Ch. 6, sl. st. into third stitch to form picot, ch. 6, picot, ch. 3, 1 s. c. in 4th single from starting point, this make 1 p., ch. Repeat around, making last ch. meet first ch., now sl. st. to center of first ch. between 2 p, s. Join each row and sl. st. in this way. Make 7 more rows of p., chs.



Make 15 or more roses or a rose for every 6 picot chs.

ROSE USED IN IRISH LACE CENTERPIECE.

8th row.—Sl. st. to center p. ch., ch. 6, 1 p. ch. 2, 1 sl. st. in center of petal of rose, ch. 6, 1 p., ch. 3, join next p., ch. to center of next petal. Now 4 p. chs. Join next two chs. to second rose, 4 p. chs., repeat.

Make one row of p. chs. around the roses, then complete the rows between the roses by working p. chs. back and forth joining to the chains already worked around the roses. Next one row of chains completely around doily, but making each chain a little larger by working ch. 4 between the 2 p's in each ch.

HAND-MADE TABLE LINEN. By Mrs. Winsor and Mrs. Nutting.

WOODEN FRAME WITH COTTON WOUND ON IT AND COMPLETED MAT.

Follow this with one row ch. 9, 1 s. c. between picots. Last row, 4 d. c., 1 p., 4 d. c., 1 p., 4 d. c. under each chain 9.

Directions for Roses

Ch. 5, join in ring.

1st round.—Ch. 5, 1 d. c. in ring, ch. 2, 1 d. c., ch. 2, 1 d. c., ch. 2, 1 d. c., ch. 2, 1 d. c., ch. 2, sl. st. to first ch. 5, making 6 spaces in all.

2nd round.—Ch. 1, 5 d. c., 1 s. c. under ch. 2, or first sp. Repeat in each sp. to form first row of petals.

3rd round.—Ch. 5, 1 s. c. under d. c. between the first and second groups of doubles in last round. Repeat making a ch. 5 behind each group of doubles.

4th round.—1 s. c., 7 d. c., 1 s. c. under first ch. 5, repeat under each ch. This forms second row of petals.

5th round.—Ch. 7, 1 s. c. between petals. Repeat 5 times.

6th round.—1 s. c., 9 d. c., 1 s. c. under each ch. 7, fasten off.

After one has the edge of the doily far enough along for the roses, count the number of picot chains in the last row of the lace. Allow 2 p. chs. to fasten to each rose and 6 chs. between, then make up number of roses needed and work in.

The several pieces of work which have come in from our readers show conclusively that COMFORT housewives are quick to adopt new ideas to their own particular needs in making their homes as attractive and comfortable as possible. A good illustration of this is the scarfs and handbag of tied or woven squares shown at the top of this page.

Directions for doing this particular sort of work appeared in our last September issue and seemed at once to become quite popular. As the work is very simple, does not cause eye strain and its possibilities are so great we are glad to again illustrate the frame and the work in detail.

For the best results use a soft mercerized cotton, the size being determined by the article made. A frame such as is illustrated is necessary. To wind this tie one end securely around one corner of the frame carry the cotton to the first notch on upper side of the frame. Hold the frame by this corner and wind, back and forth to the first notch on the opposite side seven or more times, carry cotton to second notch and wind around the frame, the same number of times, so continue until threads have been wound in each pair of notches on these sides. Carry cotton from last notch around corner to first notch and wind the frame in the opposite direction in the same way. Fasten at the last corner.

Do not wind the cotton tight on the frame, but just so that there is no slack.

Thread a bodkin with white or colored silkateen. Begin by knotting around the first threads which cross in one corner, tie diagonally across to the opposite corner, knotting on the wrong side as shown in cut. Cross all the threads in this direction then recross in the opposite direction from corner to corner; this will form a crossing of the knotting threads at each crossing of the mat threads. When the tying is finished cut the mat open with a knife along two edges of the frame; the other two edges can be cut with the scissors. Shake out and even the fringe.

HAND BAG. FIG. 3.

Scarf Fig. 1. To copy this scarf make three square mats the proper size. Cut the threads only on three sides of the two end mats, and on two sides only of the center mat. Join by tying the looped ends of one mat to the side of the next mat. Run ribbon through these spaces, finish with bows and mount all on a piece of scalloped silk on sateen.

Scarf Fig. 2. This linen bureau cover has an edge of smaller mats, with the tying of the lower corner threads omitted, to give a rounded outline, only cut the threads of the lower side of these mats, join as in Fig. 1, sew to edge of hemmed linen allowing an extra mat in each corner as shown, so the work will lie flat. Run ribbons between the mats finishing the ends with a flat loop and end.

POINTED MEDALLION. DIRECTIONS ON NEXT PAGE.

Hand Bag Fig. 3. This may be made of two mats of any desired size, line with silk in the usual way. Hot plate mats, small table covers, or a bedspread may all be made in this way. For a full size bedspread 42 mats 15 inches square will be needed. Use No. 5 mercerized cotton and make mats 16 strands thick. Do not cut sides of mats and join by tying loops to sides of next mat, as in scarf Fig. 1, spread will be seven squares in length by six in width. Fill spaces in corners between squares, by weaving small mats or crossing threads and working in a spider web.

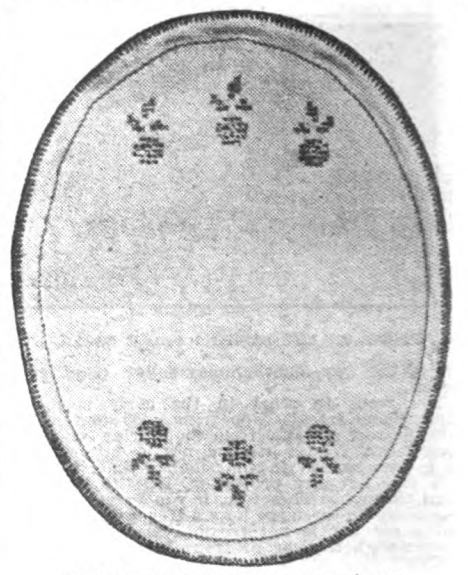
Hot Plate Mats

Either with or without a tablecloth hot plate mats of asbestos are a great convenience or rather a real necessity nowadays.

Our first illustration of a home-made covering for these mats, which can be bought in various sizes and shapes, is of linen cross-stitched with tiny rosebuds. The edge is finished by closely buttonholing and the two thicknesses of linen caught together by outlining closely all around the shape of the asbestos mats. One end is left open and fastens together with snap catches.

Crocheted Covers

A set of covers for different size mats may be made very easily of a soft mercerized cotton as follows.



Ch. 6, join in ring.

1st round.—21 s. c. in ring.

2nd round.—Ch. 5, 1 s. c. in 3rd st., repeat making 7 chs. 5 in all.

To make smaller mats simply begin to point of spokes of the wheel sooner as in 22nd row.

These mat covers can be made secure by running a crocheted cord in the last row, drawing up closely and tying.

Crocheted Trimmed Cushion Cover

BY GRACIA SHULL.

Pin cushions or cushion covers are always in order for what woman, unless she lives in the South Sea Islands, uses no pins? The cover here shown will surely delight any feminine heart who loves dainty personal belongings. Linen showing a bit of embroidery is made still more attractive and practical by the addition of the crocheted motif in the center. For this use rather fine cotton and work as follows: Ch. 36, turn and make 11 spaces, ch. 5, turn. Next 2 rows the same.

CROCHETED TRIMMED CUSHION COVER.

4th row.—5 sps., 5 d. c. in next sp. joining first and last d. c., to form a cluster, 5 sps.

5th row.—4 sps., 1 cluster, 1 sp., 1 cluster, 4 sps., ch. 5, turn.

6th row.—3 sps., 1 cluster, 3 sps., 1 cluster, 3 sps., ch. 5, turn.

Now a row like 5th, then one like 4th, 3 rows all sps.

Edge—2 clusters in corners separated by ch. 5, then cluster in every other space with ch. 5 between.

Edging—1 s. c. all around in edge of linen, then 2 rows of sps. making extra ones at the corners by making extra doubles. This gives the necessary fullness. Close the end of each round with a slip st.

3rd row.—Cluster in every other sp. with ch. 5 between.

4th row.—Ch. 6, 1 s. c. under each ch. 5.

5th row.—The same.

Cushion Covers

One can hardly be overstocked with a supply of sofa pillow covers for every-day use. These to be serviceable should be made of something substantial and also washable. A fairly coarse linen or crash combines these qualities and is also a material suitable for different sorts of embroidery.

To introduce a little color very attractively and rapidly any rather bold embroidery design, having well defined lines and fairly large spaces can be very easily worked out and a rather Japanese effect obtained, as shown in our illustration of a sofa pillow and also in Fig. 5.

APPLIQUE PATCH PILLOW COVER.

The possibilities of this sort of work are great and quite elaborate effects can be obtained with a minimum amount of work.

To prepare any suitable stamped piece of work to be embroidered in this way, simply draw horizontal lines about a quarter inch apart, across each leaf and flower. Usually the designs are worked out by combining several shades of one color. This gives a very pretty effect. Work each leaf or petal entirely of one shade.

Begin by couching down a thread on all the horizontal lines. Taking a stitch every half or three quarters of an inch with thread of the same shade. Draw all ends through and fasten down on the wrong side.

After these lines are finished with needle and thread, take short quarter inch stitches, below each horizontal line. These stitches should be quite near together, all as nearly the same length as possible and perfectly straight, or just at a right angle to the horizontal lines.

Crochet Edging on Pillow

This narrow edging which is suitable for scarfs, doilies, etc. is made as follows. Make chain the length desired. Turn, 6 s. c., ch. 3 for p., 4 s. c., ch. 12, 1 sl. st. in third single from end. Under ch. 12 work 3 s. c., ch. 3 for p., 7 s. c., ch. 3, 3 s. c., * 5 s. c. in original ch., 1 p., 4 s. c., ch. 12, sl. st. in second single from finished loop. Under ch. 12 work 3 s. c., 1 p., 4 s. c., ch. 12, turn, 1 s. c. in center finished loop. Turn, 4 s. c., 1 p., 2 s. c., 1 p., 2 s. c., 1 p., 2 s. c., 1 p., 4 s. c. Now under second ch. work 3 s. c., 1 p., 3 s. c. Repeat from *.

Applique Patchwork

Another of the recent practical novelties in needlework is the modern adaptation of patchwork as shown in our design on this page.

This square pillow cover is a good example of the effectiveness of this work.

The different motifs of a design are cut from linens or cambrics of color and then these outlines softened by French knots of coarse mercerized cotton.

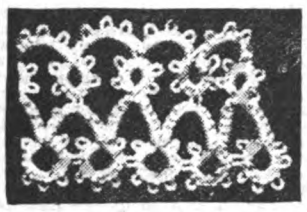
In this design the large rose like motifs are of light rose linen the centers finished with a group of dark rose French knots surrounded with one row of a lighter shade of French knots, this same shade being used for the knots around the edge of the rose. The narrow circle is of dark green finished with knots of the same shade. All the leaves on the circle are of light green with French knots to match, excepting the two outside leaves of the group of three which are tipped with pink and then quite well covered with knots of the darker pink.

SIMPLE EMBROIDERY IN SHADES OF BLUE ON LINEN.

In doing this work, the various pieces should be cut out very carefully. Turn all edges in a quarter inch and arrange and paste in place. Finish by felling all edges down with thread to exactly match and then add the French knots.

Unbleached cotton finished with a border in bright colors of various animals, sunbonnet babies of simple outline in this applique work, is especially suitable for children's crib coverlets.

Simple New Designs in Tatting



BY MRS. F. L. SMITH.

Of all the varieties of handwork which we see in the present craze for such decorations, the old-fashioned tatting bids fair to become the most popular. Perhaps this popularity is in a measure due to the fact that while tatting can be made quite as effective as embroidery, Irish crochet and like handmade trimmings, it is more easily learned and more rapidly made. The designs illustrated, which at first glance appear somewhat intricate, can be easily made by any one who has mastered the first steps in tatting—the single ring and picot.

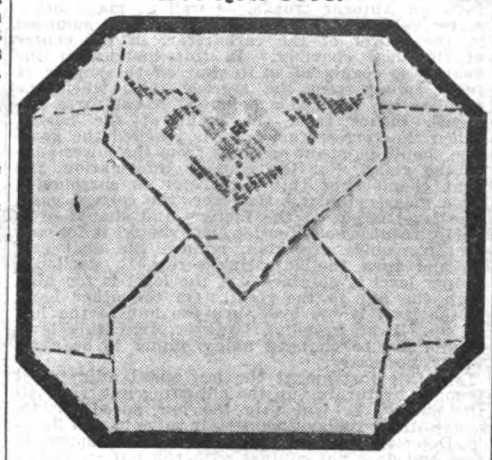
Fig. 4. is a beading, or insertion having both sides alike. The spool is used in making the three leaves of the clover leaf and the spool and shuttle are used for the bar. First make a cloverleaf in which the first and third rings or leaves have 7 picots with 2 d. s. between, and center rings has 9 picots with 2 d. s. between. The shuttle is used in making the clover leaf. Make a clover leaf, then a bar followed by another clover leaf in opposite direction. With spool and shuttle make a horizontal bar of 9 d. s. followed by another clover leaf. Proceed in this way until the desired length is completed.

Tatted Beading

This beading is made in two rows. First, make a ring of 7 p. with 2 d. s. between each picot. Then with spool and shuttle make 6 d. s. With shuttle make 5 picoted ring with 2 d. s. between each picot. With spool and shuttle make 6 more double stitches. Now make a 7 picoted ring and join it to the ring first made at the second picot.

TATTED BEADING.

With spool and shuttle make a scallop of 12 d. s. with a p. in the middle of scallop.



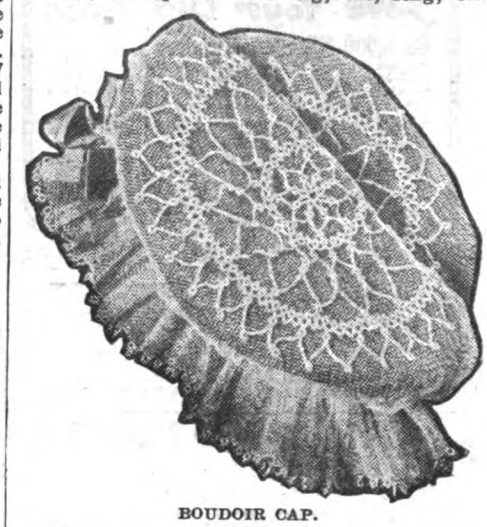
Proceed as in the beginning, alternating a ring and a scallop.

The upper row alternates something as the lower. The thread is fastened to the third picot of the ring, and a 3 p. scallop is made, then make a 5 p. ring, and join to the picot of the scallop in the first row. Make a 4 p. scallop. Fasten the thread to the third p. of the next ring of the first row.

Pointed Medallion

One 7 p. ring, with shuttle and spool 3 p. chain of scallop, with shuttle 1 ring of 2 d. s., 1 p., 2 d. s., 1 p., 2 d. s., 1 p., 2 d. s., 3 p. ch., 7 p. ring, join to first ring, repeat, making 6 rings and 6 points.

Hot Roll Cover



FOR HOT ROLLS. FIG. 5.

Work the same style of embroidery as is shown on sofa pillow. If simple designs are chosen for this kind of embroidery one can achieve just the right proportion of color to make many bits of household linen distinctive.

Boudoir Cap

For the tatted top which is afterwards appliqued to the net begin with center ring of 7 p. with 3 d. s. between, close, with spool and shuttle, ch. 5 d. s., with shuttle along small ring, 2 d. s., 1 p., repeat twice, 2 d. s., close, ch 5 d. s., join to p. of center ring, ch., ring, ch.,

BOUDOIR CAP.

join to next p., repeat around, making 8 points in all. Join and break thread. Join thread to center p. of a ring, ch. 9 d. s., small ring same as in last round, ch., repeat all around, join and break thread.

With shuttle make ring 2 d. s., 1 p., 2 d. s., join to center p. of ring in last round, 2 d. s., 1 p., 2 d. s., ch. 3 d. s., 1 p., 3 d. s., 1 ring of 3 p., joining to last ring, ch. 6 d. s., 1 ring, ch. 6 d. s. with 1 p., repeat all around making every other ch. with a p. and joining every fifth ring to ring in last round. Finish by joining to first ring made and break thread.

4th round.—One 3 p. ring, joining second p. to p. of ch. in last row, ch. 9 d. s., 3 p. ring, ch., ring, join to p. of ch. in last row, ch., ring, repeat all around, join and break thread.

5th round.—3 p. ring, joining to center of ring in last row, ch. 18 d. s. ring, ch., ring joined to rings of last row, repeat, join and break thread.

6th round.—Same as third. Rings 3 p. and every 7th ring joined to ring of last row. Chs. 4 d. s., 1 p., 4 d. s., join and break thread.

7th round.—Same as 5th excepting chains are only 14 d. s. Join rings to every third ch. in last round.

Edge the frill with simple tatted rings, each 5 d. s., 1 p., 5 d. s., close. Run in elastic and finish with twist of ribbon and full bow in front.

Tatted Edging

This edging is pretty for scarfs, towels, doilies or for any purpose where one wants a little more than the simplest tatted edge.

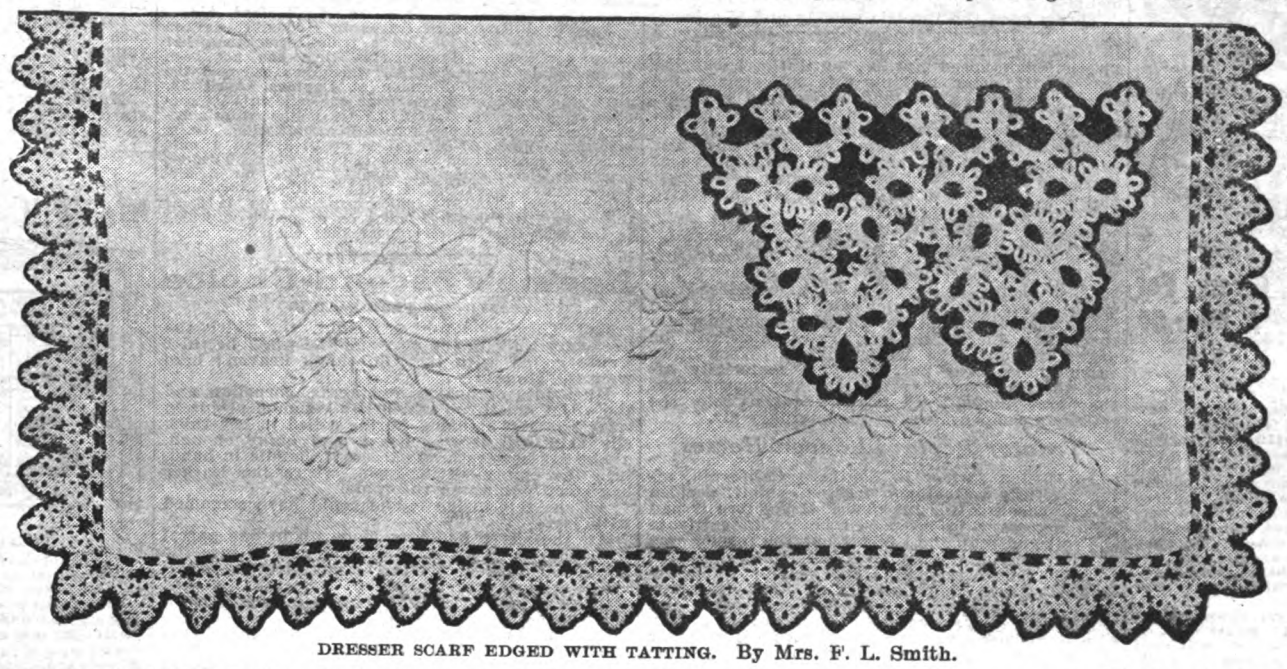
A shuttle and spool is required for this pattern, with shuttle make 7 p. ring, with spool and shuttle 7 p. scallop, repeat, making rings and scallops alternately, until 6 rings are complete. Join all rings together by picots on either side of the center p. of each ring. After sixth ring, 1 scallop then 7 p. ring, join to center p. of last scallop, 1 scallop, repeat pattern.

TATTED EDGING.

Tatted Medallion

After completing sixth ring in above edging, make scallop and join to first ring. Insertion may be made by joining medallions.

FOUR-LEAF CLOVER DESIGN.



Four-leaf clover designs in very fine thread make a dainty and beautiful trimming for handkerchiefs. The directions for making are as follows: Make each ring with 7 p. with 2 d. s. between each p. and joined together closely at the base of each ring, and at the first picot of each ring. An unbroken thread as long as the strip of tatting, if possible, is carried along on the back of the tatting. This insures even, firm work.

Dresser Scarf

The scarf edged with tatted vandyke points gives one at the first glance the impression of being a much more elaborate and complicated pattern than it really is. The handsome effect being quite easily obtained by working the points first and then adding the top row of rings and scallops.

Begin the points with a 7 p. ring, another 7 p. ring close to the first in opposite direction. A 3 p. scallop, another 7 p. ring joined to the second ring made at the third p. Make a 7 p. ring opposite the last followed by a 3 p. scallop. A clover leaf of two 7 p. rings and one 9 p. ring forms the point. Finish as commenced after the clover leaf is made. Only in reverse order.

Border the points with one row made with spool and shuttle, thus; make a 3 p. ring, followed by 3 p. scallop joined to the top rings of the points at the second picots of the scallops.

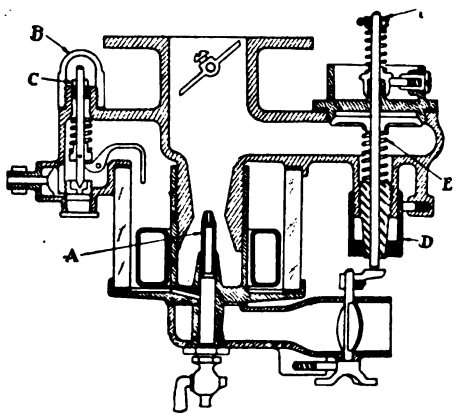
More About Carburetors



ALTHOUGH it was pointed out in the previous article that the principle of carburetion is comparatively simple, the construction of a successful carburetor is not the simple problem one is apt to imagine. If the motor ran at a certain speed at all times the problem would be comparatively easy. However such is not the case. At times the motor may be required to run at approximately 200 revolutions per minute while at other times, 2,000 or more revolutions. Since all air is drawn through the carburetor by the vacuum created by the pistons, it is obvious that the amount of air drawn through the carburetor is reliant upon the speed of piston travel. If this is the condition the reader is apt to think that as more air is drawn through the carburetor at high engine speeds, the amount of gasoline picked up will be proportionate thus resulting in an ideal condition. However, this theory is contrary to the law of liquid bodies.

The exact condition is that the flow of fuel from the jet increases under suction faster than the flow of air. Therefore if some provision were not made to offset this condition, a mixture entirely too rich for proper motor operation would be the result. A number of carburetor designers allow for this condition by using an auxiliary air valve.

To obtain full power it is necessary that when the gasoline is vaporized it be mixed with the proper amount of air. If mixed with too little air, there will not be sufficient oxygen to burn the carbon and hydrogen in the fuel. The result is that most of the fuel is wasted as will be indicated by the black smoke emitted from the exhaust. On the other hand if too much air is used, the mixture will be lacking in the real fuel and the result will be a slow burning mixture. Either a lean or too rich mixture is often evidenced by back-firing through the carburetor. Therefore it is well to keep in mind that it is of paramount importance that the proper proportions of gasoline and air be mixed so as to meet the varying conditions of speed, load, temperature and power.

Stromberg Type B

The best advice that can be given to the motorist is to leave the carburetor alone and endeavor to forget that there is any such instrument installed on his car. However, there are exceptions to this rule, there being times when it is necessary to make adjustment. The first make of carburetor to enter the discussion is the

STROMBERG TYPE B CARBURETOR

Stromberg Type B, which is used very successfully on Autocar trucks, as well as many other motor vehicles. The spray nozzle, A, is mounted in the center of the carburetor, in the center of the float chamber. In this instrument the float is so regulated as to shut off the supply of fuel coming from the storage tank when the gasoline has reached a height of about three sixteenth inches from the point of the nozzle. When the correct fuel level is reached the gasoline should be about one inch from the lower edge of the glass. For the reader's information, the float chamber of this carburetor is surrounded by a glass cylinder. However, the correct gasoline level is set at the factory and should ordinarily require no attention, but should it for any reason require attention, remove the dust cap, B, and turn the adjusting screw, C, until the proper level is obtained. If the level is too high turn the nut to the right. On the other hand if the level is too low, turn the nut to the left or up. Bear in mind, however, that this level should not be changed unless found to be absolutely necessary.

On this instrument the low speed adjustment is made by turning up the adjusting nut, D, until the spring, E, which is the low speed spring, causes the auxiliary poppet air valve to seat lightly. Determine that the high speed or top spring is free and does not contact with the nut on top of the auxiliary air valve stem. Next start the the motor and with the throttle closed, turn the nut, D, in either direction until the motor idles smoothly. This is the low speed adjustment.

Throw open the throttle quickly and if a backfire occurs through the carburetor, the mixture is too lean and should be remedied by turning up the high speed nut, F, until the backfiring ceases. If after making this adjustment the motor seems to have a tendency to load or choke, the mixture is too rich and the nut, F, should be turned down until the proper adjustment is obtained. This is the high speed setting. The spring controlled by the nut, F, should have at least one thirty-second inch clearance between it and the top of nut on the auxiliary air valve stem when the motor is at rest.

Before attempting to adjust any carburetor, regardless of its make, be certain that each cylinder is developing high compression, the valve lifters are not too closely set up, and that a hot spark is being delivered in each cylinder. Also carefully examine the inlet valve guides. If these show wear it cannot be hoped to smoothly idle the motor due to the extra air which will be drawn through the worn guides. Worn inlet valve guides will not, however, materially affect the high speed setting for the reason that the large amount of mixture taken into the cylinders compensates for the auxiliary air.

Tractor Replaced Seven Horses

In 1915 a farmer in Southern California, after carefully watching a tractor exhibit, decided to purchase one for his place. Heretofore it had been necessary to use seven horses to cultivate the soil and reap the harvest but the farmer was readily convinced that with the tractor, horses were no longer required. This tractor which developed seven horse-power at the draw-bar, for plowing, harrowing, seeding, cultivating and similar uses was operated for a nine-hour day at a total operating expense, exclusive of operator of two dollars. It was found that this tractor ploughed deeper and turned over more land in one day than was possible with the seven horses. During the idle season it was readily discovered that the tractor was suitable for other varieties of work. It was used as a stationary engine, developing 20 horse-power at the belt. From seven o'clock in the morning until noon, 31 tons of bean straw was baled. On the best farms it was found that the tractor was adapted to pumping, threshing, baling and other kinds of work too numerous to mention.

The farmers soon recognized that the tractor did not stop for heat or cold, did not require hours of careful attention as did horses at the end of the day, was economical on lubricating oil and could be run for one hour on two gallons of gasoline.

Overhaul Pays

The motorist who is running his car for a second season has no doubt discovered that an overhaul on a small scale or at least a rigid inspection of the mechanical parts at this time of year will stand between large repair bills and spoiled pleasure later on. Start with the motor and take in the details of the car as the work progresses. Scrape or have burned by the oxygen method all carbon from the pistons and combustion chambers. Remove all lubricant from the crankcase, transmission, rear axle, etc., and subject the cases and working parts to a good cleaning with kerosene. Test the bearings for looseness and if necessary take up all play by adjustment. The instruction book usually incorporates specific directions for doing this work. Go over every nut with a large wrench to make sure that they are well drawn up. Next bear in mind that the recognized common cause of the premature failure of automobiles is the lack of lubrication. A number of places which must be lubricated by the operator are not visible and it is therefore imperative that the manufacturer's oiling chart be carefully followed. There is usually an oiling chart incorporated in the regular instruction book while in some instances the maker furnishes a large wall chart showing the particular points which must be given attention. Every motor car company maintains a Service Department whose business it is to cooperate with the owner in the maintenance and care of the car. If in doubt write to this department requesting instructions concerning the lubricating of the car. In a number of instances the manufacturer recommends special brands of lubricants for the motor, transmission, rear axle, etc. More damage may be done to an unlubricated car in a single trip than would be the case in several seasons of legitimate use. Besides this there will be less repair bills and added enjoyment.

New Hold-Up Method

Highwaymen are employing a new trick to hold up occupants of motor cars. The trick consists of placing a tire in the middle of the road and as can naturally be expected a driver who happens to pass that way and sees the tire believes that the same has been dropped by some motorist who had previously travelled the route. However as the driver stops his car to pick up the tire the highwaymen emerge from their hiding place and with levelled guns demand that the occupants of the car give up their valuables. This trick is practised mostly at night and on country highways.

Precaution Against Theft

Stealing of automobiles is becoming common practise especially in the larger cities. It is obvious therefore that a car, especially if it be a new one, should not be left unattended for long periods. As a matter of quick reference to assist in identification and tracing the owner should keep a record of the engine number, chassis number, and all other minor peculiarities. There are now on the market, varying in price, several types of locking devices, which although they do not afford infallible protection against the expert thief, are of considerable value as a safeguard. The thief usually likes to make a quick get away. If he is compelled to fathom a locking device before the car can be placed in operation he will usually abandon the job for fear of being caught in the act.

Heed This Precaution

The small boy is a natural pest to the average motorist. The average American youth is mechanically inclined and enjoys nothing better than to tamper with the various parts of the automobile in the absence of the owner. One of the most serious of the tampering stunts is to release the emergency brake. If the car is left standing on an incline the steering gear should be left so as to direct the car to the curb or bank. Some motorists make doubly sure that no such accident will occur by placing the gear shifting lever in the reverse position. The reverse gear is the one of lowest ratio and therefore offers more resistance to the propulsion of the vehicle than any other. If the motorist will bear this suggestion in mind there will be little danger that should the small boy release the emergency lever of the car making a wild run down hill until it is brought to an abrupt stop by some soldid object.

Questions Answered

SPEED RECORDS.—Which is the speedier machine, the automobile or the motorcycle? What is the greatest speed attained by each respectively?

J. A. T., Bedford, Ala.

A.—The Blitzen Benz driven by Teddy Tetzlaf on the Salt Beds in Utah did a trifle better than 144 miles per hour. However his time has not been recognized by the A. A. A., which has endorsed the time made by Bob Burman at Daytona, April 23, 1911 who drove a Blitzen Benz one mile in 25.4 seconds, making a speed of 140.9. It is the editor's belief that Tetzlaf drove for only a half mile. On a motorcycle John A. McNeal is credited with a mile in 35.4 seconds which is a little better than 100 miles per hour, he driving at Omaha, Nebr., for a distance of a mile on Oct. 4, 1914. Aitken drove at a little better than 104 miles per hour in 1916 at Sheepshead Bay for 305 miles on a speedway, which is the best time on record for that class.

erals! They would give weight, the skirt the necessary bulk to the bag, and the would-be thief would go off with it. Oh, thank heaven! here were the stones!

Huge bits of quartz and agate, cornelian and the uncut amethyst, which is a common pebble in some parts of Canada. Nerine rolled in her thick silk skirt till it was heavy and bulky enough.

She set her teeth as she crept, bundle in hand, into the empty sitting-room, where the leather bag stood gaping on the table.

As she felt inside it she could have screamed with joy.

All the silver had been done up in one parcel with paper and string. She had not to face the impossible task of getting it out piece by piece.

She had it out in a few moments and the stones and silk in; but there was no more brown paper to go over the top.

The telltale purple-and-black brocade flared consciously in the lamplight.

"Oh! there was a piece under the table. It would do, but the silver must be put out of reach first.

With incredible quickness and noiselessness Nerine flew back into her mother's room, where the cold, sooty draught from the open fireplace had given her an inspiration.

She shoved her precious bundle out of sight up the chimney and glided softly back to cover up the betraying brocade. She thrust the brown paper down hard and firm till it looked exactly as it had before the silver was abstracted. How lucky that she had thought of the skirt! The stones would never have done without it.

Both hands in the bag, leaning over it, she looked precisely as though she were feeling what its contents might be; and she forgot for a minute that great haste was needed. In another instant she would be gone; another push to a recalcitrant stone would make it safer. She was bending absorbedly over the bag and peering into it.

Something wet and cold and stifling came suddenly across her face, jerking her head back with a sickening shock.

With a scream, born half of fear, half of rage, Nerine turned and struggled frantically, and her scream hastened her undoing. As she drew her breath after it a strong vapor choked her; her heart began to leap with dreadfully uneven bounds she could not keep from screaming without her own volition now. Wild and shrill her voice rose, inarticulate, piercing. Then her head dropped. She fell silent and senseless on the floor.

* * * * * * * * * * * *

It always seemed to Nerine that on that dreadful afternoon she dreamed a series of strange and fantastic dreams, and then came suddenly out of them, to find herself lying on the floor—alone and in the dark.

She felt dizzy and very cold. As she tried to sit up, her teeth chattered and a deadly feeling of sickness conquered her. She sank on the floor again, but she was awake—the dreadful dreams were gone.

After a minute she propped her head on her hand and looked hard into the darkness that surrounded her. The room was empty. She felt sure it was; and a cold draught was blowing on her. If she did not get out of that icy wind (which she owed her life, had she known it) she would shiver herself into pieces!

Holding fast to the table, the girl scrambled up. In all her faintness her first thought was of the silver. The bag was gone! Then the woman could not have suspected the change or stopped to look.

Nerine gave a feeble little giggle of triumph. She had got into this trouble to some purpose, after all!

It took her an interminable time to get into the other room and undo the door into the corridor. She did not dare now to drop out of that open window into the dark; someone might be waiting for her outside.

When the door was opened, and a faint gleam of comforting lamplight could be seen at the far end of the passage, she felt braver and better.

She got her sooty treasure out of the chimney with a hard tug or two, and with it clasped in her arms went out into the passage. She reeled as she made her slow way along it. But she must get to the others—must above all things get to the fire! There was a deathly coldness creeping on her again.

In the morning-room (hospitably far off still) the tea party was over.

Five o'clock had struck, and six o'clock; Agatha had cut the cake, while Kit had devoured the taffy Nerine had brought her, inquiring carelessly for her the while. Agatha said she must be dressing.

At half past six Satterlee bade good by, and Agatha, with rather a guilty feeling, began really to wonder what could have become of Nerine. She ran up-stairs to see, but Nerine was not there.

She must have gone out again," Maurice said, when his elder sister returned breathless.

"Ask Jane," Kit recommended from where she sat with her little feet on the hearth. "I suspect she is in the kitchen having her clothes dried."

"She must have forgotten about the cake, then." Maurice was politely cynical. "Get along, Agatha, and see."

But as Agatha's hand was on the door it opened from the outside. Nerine—staggering, skirtless, her face both dirty and ghasty—was among them, bearing in her arms an enormous brown bundle, which she let fall as she groped her way to the nearest chair.

"Maurice," she ejaculated. "Mr. Mayne's room! our silver!"

She shivered convulsively. "I'm so frightfully —cold!" she muttered.

Agatha sprang toward her.

"What's the matter? Are you ill? Where have you been?"

But Nerine was past saying anything.

"I'll get some brandy!" Maurice was gone and back in a minute, and as he stooped over his sister a strong smell of chloroform startled him.

"Nerine!" he said, sternly, "wake up! Tell me, where have you been? Mr. Mayne's room, did you say?"

"Yes," as the brandy roused her she shivered violently.

"No, don't go," catching him by the arm. "It's too long ago. She's gone."

"Who's gone?"

"I don't know," and she giggled hysterically. "But she hasn't got anything, after all."

Agatha mixed hot water with the brandy and held it to Nerine's cold lips.

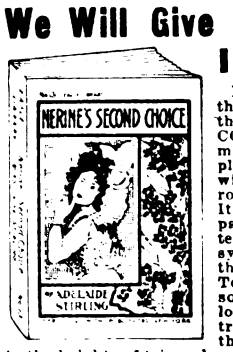
"Wait," she said; "you'll be all right in a minute. Maurice, you go to Mr. Mayne's room and see."

"No! no!" Nerine cried, desperately. "I'm all right now. I can tell you about it. And the silver is all right!"

"I must go," Maurice said, half roughly. "The house must have been robbed. Don't you see she has been chloroformed?"

Nerine, lying in the chair, held tightly by his sleeve.

"Maurice, it's all right," she said, earnestly. "The doors were all locked, and the woman had gone when I came to myself. I'll tell you everything in a minute."



"Where's the skirt of your dress?" Kit's voice rose suddenly in horrified surprise. "You're in your petticoat! And where are your shoes?"

"I don't know. My skirt has gone instead of the silver. The silver is in the bundle!"

Maurice tore open the brown-paper parcel and stared as the Dispenard possessions rolled one by one on the floor.

A Woman's Intuition

By Hapsburg Liebe

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

WHEN David Rayne was twenty-four, he owned the controlling interest in a piano factory, and he had climbed to that position through his own efforts. It is not so strange. For generations the Raynes had been captains of the piano-making industry. Then there came adversity that even David Rayne could not overcome, and he went to the wall hard. But he didn't stay down long. Within two more years, he was in a fair way to own the controlling interest in another piano factory.

And now he was about to go down again, and it was all because of the same shrewd and overwhelming forces that had driven him to the wall before. These forces were in the hands of rich old Theodore Hart, a rival piano manufacturer, and they were built on a foundation of vengeance rather than cold-blooded business. Theodore Hart had ruined David Rayne's father and thereby sent him to his death. Still Theodore Hart wasn't satisfied.

David Rayne went to his apartments two hours before the closing of his offices, and changed his business suit for clothing more comfortable. It is warm in New Orleans in June. Then he set out for a fashionable residence section to see Isobel Corinth, his fiancee. He found her in a lawn swing under the magnolias, and sitting opposite her was old Theodore Hart's nephew Albert. The Harts lived next door, in a palace of white brick and granite.

Rayne saw that Isobel was bored. He held back an inclination to wring Hart's neck, bowed and spoke to Isobel.

"Glad you came, David," smiled Isobel. "Sit down."

She moved over, and he sat down beside her. Hart frowned, muttered something that stamped him as a person of bad manners, found his hat and went home.

"Glad he's gone, David," said Isobel. "I tolerate him only because I want to keep peace here at home. He will inherit all his uncle's wealth, and they want me to break off with you and marry him, since your affairs are—er, in bad shape. But I shan't, David. I'd rather marry a goat. His brain would rattle inside a mustard seed. Now, David, honey, I know what you came here to say, and you needn't say it!"

Rayne's sober gray eyes lighted.

"What did I come here to say?"

"This: 'In view of the fact that I seem to be going broke again, Miss Corinth, I feel in honor bound to offer you your liberty.' what you came here to say. I don't want my liberty, David, dear. I'd let you kiss me, if mother wasn't watching us from an up-stairs window. Please act very stiff, Mr. Rayne!"

"But the rows I will have to hoe would be pretty tough for you to share," muttered Rayne. "I'll have to build up all over again, you know—perhaps I'll have to build up all over again several times, Isobel."

"I'll help you," declared Isobel. "Tell me, how does old Hart do it?"

"In every way you can think of. By fair means and by foul means, but always within the law. For instance, he almost duplicates all our patterns, and he sells the instruments for less than it costs to build them. He's worth twenty times what we're worth, and he can afford it, you see. He caused my father's death, and that was the cause of my mother's death, and now he's hounding me. You don't know why? My mother married my father instead of him—that's why!"

"And that's why he never married," murmured Isobel.

"It may be," thoughtfully. "But that didn't make him wicked; it merely brought out the wickedness that was already in him."

Mrs. Corinth came out. She sat down opposite Rayne and his fiancee, chatted gaily for a few minutes, then suggested that her daughter attend to certain pressing little duties. Isobel gave Rayne a glance that was full of meaning, and went to the house. When she had disappeared, Mrs. Corinth turned to Rayne.

"I am sorry, indeed, to hear of your misfortunes," she said. She had heard of them through Albert Hart. "And I am sorry," she went on, "that I must tell you that your engagement with Isobel is at an end. You will understand, I am sure. Isobel is our only child; we want her to marry a man who can give her what she's always had. I hope you understand, Mr. Rayne."

"Perfectly," said Rayne, and he rose and walked away without another word.

He did not look back until he had reached the street, and then he saw Isobel standing on the old-fashioned second-story veranda. Isobel threw him a kiss.

As he was about to pass the Hart residence, Albert Hart hailed him from the lawn.

"Looks like somebody'd handed you a black eye!" laughed Hart.

It turned Rayne's blood to fire. A few quick steps took him to a position two yards from Hart. Then he lunged forward and drove his fist to Hart's pink-and-white face.

"Yes, and misery loves company," he growled as he turned toward the street.

Isobel Corinth saw it. She clapped her hands. Hart picked himself up and went toward his uncle's palace of white brick and granite with one hand over a fast-blackening eye.

The crash came, and David Rayne had nothing left. Most of his influential friends deserted him. He was no longer a good fellow at his club. Invitations to dinners and receptions and balls no longer came to him. When he tried to interest capital in the starting of another business, he found that Theodore Hart had placed insurmountable barriers in his way. When he tried to find a position as superintendent of a furniture factory, Hart's hand kept him from it. His healthy brain became sick because of the succeeding disappointments, and he began to lie awake at nights in his cheap bed in a cheap lodging-house and dream dreams of avengement. Finally he decided that he would whip old Theodore Hart as man never was whipped before. Then he decided that he would kill old Theodore Hart. Had not Hart brought about the death of his father and his mother?

But his better self revolted at the idea of killing a man. He put that idea aside. However, he would whip Hart, old as he was, as man never was whipped before. He left his room at dusk, with his coat buttoned to his chin and the rim of his soft black hat drawn low. Half an hour's walking brought him to the palace of white brick and granite, every window of which was lighted.

David Rayne stole across the broad veranda with the steps of a thief, and peered in at the open library window. He saw Theodore Hart sitting at the heavy oaken table; Hart's forearms were crossed on the table, and his iron-gray head lay on his forearms; evidently he was asleep. Rayne went to the front door, opened the screen soundlessly, and soundlessly stole into the library. He seized one of Hart's shoulders and shook him roughly to awaken him. Hart's head turned so that he saw one side of his face—then Rayne stepped back with a startled cry.

Theodore Hart was dead!

David Rayne stood there for a full minute, wondering, wondering. It did not occur to him that his presence there would be exceedingly damaging evidence against him. When he came to himself, young Albert Hart and the butler each had him by an arm. Rayne struggled like a madman to free himself, to no avail. He was stronger than either of them, but he was no match for both of them. The servants hurried in, and one of them went to telephone for the police. Another ran for a physician that lived a few doors away.

The neighbors began to gather, and among them were the Corinths. Isobel, pale and tremulous, walked straight up to David Rayne.

"You didn't do it, did you, David?" she asked.

"No, I didn't do it," answered the white-faced Rayne.

"Don't worry," she whispered to him. "I won't desert you, even if everybody else does. I don't know why you came here, but I know you didn't come to kill a man."

"Isobel!" reproved Mrs. Corinth. Albert would come into his inheritance soon.

"Well, mother?" said Isobel, defiantly.

"You'd better go home, I think."

Isobel gave Rayne a parting glance, turned and left the house. Isobel's father walked up to Albert Hart.

"How did he do it?"

Just then the doctor entered, and Hart didn't answer. The doctor made examinations and found the mark of a blow on the old piano manufacturer's forehead.

"He was struck with some heavy object," said the doctor, wisely.

The police came, and took David Rayne away.

* * * * * * * * * * * *

Isobel Corinth slept none that night. The next morning she rose before her mother was awake, and went to see David. He, too, had spent a sleepless night. He was haggard, and his gray eyes told her plainly that he was without hope.

"This is no place for you, Isobel," he said gloomily.

"It's no place for you, either," said Isobel, with a pale smile. "In this terrible accusation that stands against you, you are either the victim of circumstances, or you're the victim of some dark plot. I will see an attorney for you, and I will engage a private detective."

"It will avail nothing," muttered David.

She tried to encourage him, tried to put life into him, but her efforts fell short. When she left him, he was as despondent as he had been when she came. David Rayne had borne a heavy burden.

Isobel returned an hour later with an attorney and a private detective. To these Rayne gave a truthful account of all that had taken place. When the interview was over, and Isobel and her two allies were again on the street, Isobel asked the lawyer:

"What chance has he?"

"No jury would blame him very much, if he had killed Hart," answered the attorney, evasively. Juries, of course, cannot be governed by personal feeling.

Isobel went home, and heard her mother out. Mrs. Corinth was very angry. Unless Isobel ceased to be concerned about David Rayne's misfortunes, she would be locked in her room.

Two days later Isobel called her detective over the telephone.

"What have you found out?" she wanted to know.

The detective's voice came over the wire regretfully: "There's no hope for Rayne. There is not the least possible doubt that he killed Theodort Hart. Even Rayne's attorney thinks it. I have gone over the ground carefully, I assure you. Rayne will be lucky if he gets off with a sentence of twenty years in the state prison. I'm sorry to tell you this, Miss Corinth. But you'd better know the truth."

Miss Corinth hung up the receiver, went upstairs to her room, sat down and began to turn things over in her mind. She alone, of all the people that knew David Rayne, believed that he was innocent. There is nothing that is stronger, and there is nothing that is finer, than a woman's blind faith in the man she loves. If David went to the state prison for twenty years, Isobel told herself, she would wait for him. For that matter, if he went up for life, she would wait for him.

Mrs. Corinth entered the room.

"Are you still brooding over David Rayne's misfortunes?" she demanded coldly.

Isobel turned her sad face toward the window and made no answer.

"It's very foolish, my dear," said Mrs. Corinth. "Before long Albert Hart will propose marriage. You must not reject him. He is the wealthiest young man in New Orleans."

Still Isobel made no answer.

Time went on, and Albert Hart did propose. Isobel did not reject him. But she asked for a week in which to consider his proposal. She did that to keep peace at home for her.

Albert Hart's widowed mother had come to live in the palace next door, and Isobel's mother had often taken Isobel to see Mrs. Hart. When in the Harts' residence, Isobel had kept her eyes open for some sign that would give her hope for David. Always she watched for that. Nothing escaped her notice, and she weighed everything minutely. Of all the things that she saw and heard there was but one thing that seemed odd. And that was this: Albert Hart kept his eyes constantly on his butler; the butler was kept close; he had not had a single evening off since the death of his former master.

Isobel weighed that as minutely as she weighed everything else. There was a reason for it, of course. The butler, Higgins, was a loose-tongued, nervous fellow. Perhaps young Hart feared that Higgins, in an incautious moment, would let slip an inkling of some secret!

She was sure that was it.

Isobel confided her suspicions to neither Rayne's attorney nor the detective. Instead, she kept her own counsel. She thought long on ways and means by which to find out what it was that the butler knew. After a wholly sleepless night, she fell upon an idea that promised something. The idea soon became a plan that required two confidantes. Isobel employed them.

Mrs. Corinth was to spend the afternoon out, which exactly suited her daughter and her daughter's plan. When Mrs. Corinth had disappeared down the avenue, Isobel held a moment's conversation with her maid, then she went to the telephone and called Mrs. Hart.

"This is Miss Corinth," said Isobel. "Would you mind sending Higgins over with a late novel?"

"Certainly, my dear," said Mrs. Hart.

Higgins came immediately. Isobel met him at the door.

"Here is the book, Miss Corinth," said Higgins.

Isobel didn't take the novel. Her eyes were fastened on Higgins' face, and she appeared to be frightened.

"What's the matter?" she asked suddenly. "Are you ill?"

"Why—what?" Higgins muttered nervously.

"You're as white as a ghost!" said Isobel.

"White as a ghost!" repeated the butler. He was scared already.

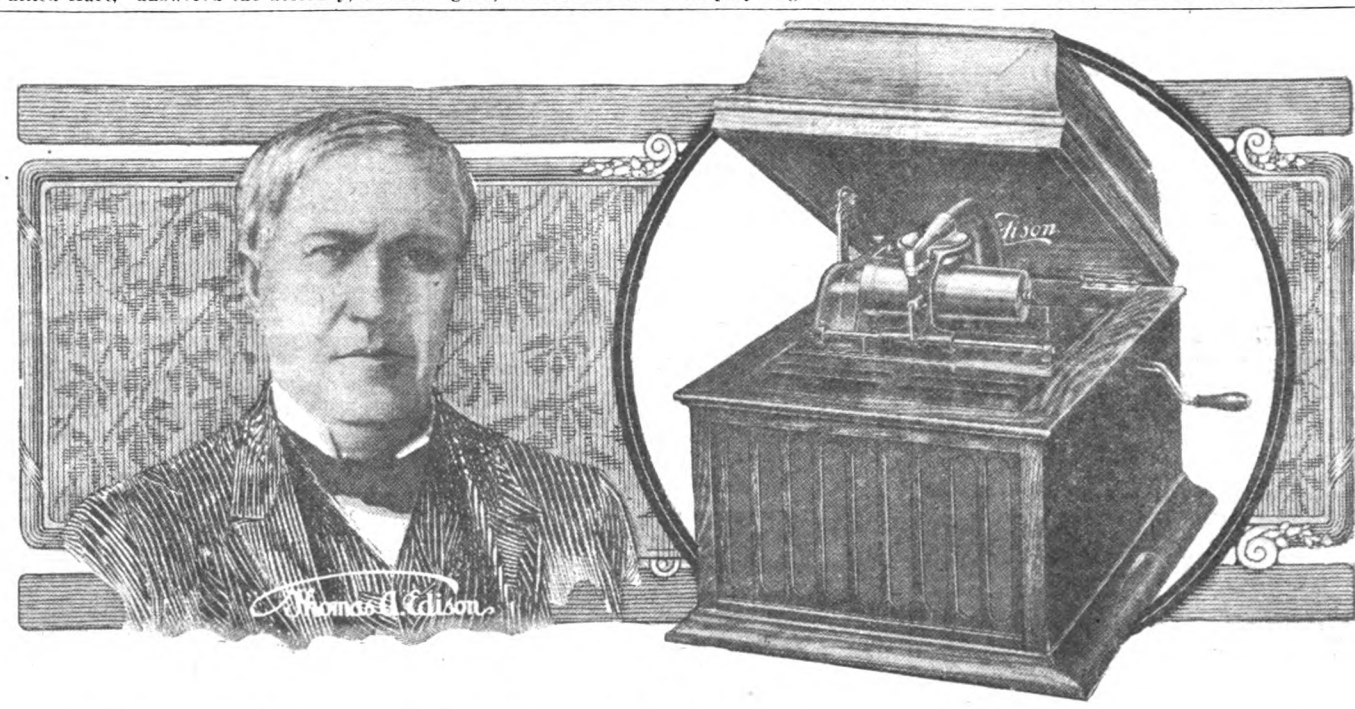
"Yes," said Isobel. She caught him by an arm. "Let me help you into the house, and I'll call in a doctor!"

Higgins protested feebly. Isobel led him into the living-room, put him on a couch, and called her maid. The maid came hastily.

"Bring a glass of water——" began Isobel, when the maid interrupted:

"What's the matter with Mr. Higgins? Oh, he's so white!" She was one of Isobel's two confidantes. She hurried for a glass of water.

Higgins stared wide-eyed at Isobel. "I—I'm sick," he groaned. "I must have been p-poisoned!"



"Perhaps you were," agreed Isobel, as though sadly. "Lie very still, and I'll 'phone for a doctor."

She ran from the room. When she came back the maid was helping Higgins to the water.

"What's the matter, Miss Isobel?" asked the maid. "What makes him so white? Has he been poisoned?"

"I think so," murmured Isobel. "Oh," clasping her hands, "will the doctor never come!"

Toughey's Travels and Adventures Abroad

their Hacienda, Mrs. Deering was very glad to accept it for her.

A Hacienda is a collection of farms and ranches and constitutes the principal source of wealth among the Mexican upper classes. The owner lives in a comfortable, rambling adobe house; the peon who cultivates the land and tends the cattle in a one-room hut or jacel (pronounced hakel), his worldly possessions rarely consisting of more than two suits of cotton clothes and a blanket, or his food other than a sufficient supply of corn, red beans (frijoles) and chili peppers. Usually, this laborer was born on the land, as his parents and grandparents probably were.

Toughey found the home life of the rich Mexican family very interesting though in some respects trying. After a day or two at her request they used the Spanish language altogether and she found herself understanding and speaking it with a facility that delighted her. Their complete isolation obliged them to depend entirely upon themselves for amusement and this took forms that Toughey with her American training found very unattractive.

Having carefully refrained from attending the bull fights in Durango, where they were of regular Sunday occurrence, she was quite appalled to find that bull fighting was the popular order of the day for the young sons of the Hacienda. Not only was she expected to approve the sport, but it was taken as a matter of course that she would be present and enjoy herself and applaud the winner. Cock fighting was another daily pastime and while the severe discipline involved in maintaining herself as an agreeable and appreciative guest was probably good for her, poor Toughey was not sorry when the limit to her visit was reached and she found herself once again with her mother and the children in their flower-scented garden at Durango.

"You don't know the joy of not eating meat cut from a bull you saw killed or a chicken you watched bleed to death," said Toughey fervently carving for herself a generous portion of crisp brown duck at her first home dinner. But she did not regret the visit and always felt the richer for the hospitality of the kindly Mexican family.

As the middle of September, the period to their holiday was not far away, the Deerings applied themselves with all of the energy possible in the disintegrating climate to collecting some of the special products of Mexico for which the country is noted.

Mrs. Deering wanted a hand woven blanket, Toughey some of the beautiful linen drawnwork at which the Mexican women are so skilled while the children were especially interested in the wonderful baskets made in the penitentiary by the prisoners.

"We've done everything expected of us here except to have an adventure with an alacran," said Toughey pausing in her packing, which was proceeding in the mirador. She lifted her eyes to the masses of geranium climbing over the garden wall, seized a shoe, darted forward and landed a sharp blow upon the wall.

"An alacran!" shouted the children running forward intensely excited.

Toughey laughed.

"No, a spider."

"Toughey!" exclaimed the little girls deeply disappointed that the harmless insect she struck at was not the famous little scorpion of Durango, whose poison is fatal to children and a deadly menace to grown people. A disagreeable monster wherever found, for some reason its venom is equal to that of a rattlesnake.

"You've had as many fearful sensations as if we had really killed an alacran, so stop complaining and be grateful," said Toughey when the children again attacked her for the fraud they felt she had practised upon them.

The day when they took a parting look at their exquisite garden, locked the house and gave the keys to their faithful friend, Mrs. Fenner, soon followed.

When the entrance gate closed behind them, Toughey sighed and tears rose to the children's eyes.

"What a perfect summer!" said Toughey regretfully.

"Except that everyone has lost flesh and feels like the dickens," murmured Mrs. Deering behind her veil.

"What, mamma?"

But Mrs. Deering did not repeat her remark.

Poultry Farming For Women

land turkeys, and the hens lay from fifty to sixty eggs a season. I usually steal about twenty from each nest, and let the old bird keep the rest. Never put more than five turkey eggs under a common chicken hen. When they hatch, put her and the turkeys into a clean coop, large enough to allow them some exercise. Our coops are six feet long, three feet wide, and two and a half feet high. Cover the front of the coop with unbleached muslin to keep out rain and allow plenty of fresh air and light to enter. Cover the bottom of the coop two or three inches deep with finely cut hay or clean sand. Feed the old hen whole corn; give the babies nothing for forty-eight hours; then feed some sour-milk curds, and give sour-milk to drink. When they are four days old, add chopped green onion tops and hard-boiled egg which has been chopped without removing the shell, add to the curds, and feed just a small quantity four or five times a day. When they are seven days old, feed the old hen whole corn in the morning, and when all the moisture has dried off the grass, let her and the little ones out. Drive them back into the coop about four o'clock, and feed curds and egg. After they are ten days old, gradually stop the egg, but give curds every night when they are put to bed, gradually adding a little finely cracked wheat or corn. Never let them get wet, and keep the coop clean. Powder the old hen before you set her, and every week as long as she broods them. When they are three weeks old, put a roost in the coop, so that they will gradually get accustomed to it before the hen leaves them. When a turkey hatches, I drive her and her brood very quietly to a brood coop, and keep them shut in for twenty-four hours, after which they are let out every morning, when the dew is off the grass, and shut up at 4 p. m., and fed in the same way as the chicken broods. Healthy, strong breeding stock, sour-milk, cleanliness and protection from damp are the only secrets of turkey raising.

J. M. H.—The rooster has dropsy of the feet, which usually arises from a gouty tendency or sluggish circulation, usually accompanied by liver trouble. Probably the bird is lazy, gets lots of grain, rich table scraps, and not enough vegetable food. Feed lightly on mash, made of wheat bran, chopped clover or Alfalfa hay, and give him plenty of sprouted oats, cabbage, or some sort of green vegetable every day. Administer two teaspoonfuls of Castor oil once a week, until he has had four doses. As the swelling goes down, feed small or cracked grain in deep litter to induce him to scratch and get the exercise he needs.

R. B. M.—It is a difficult case to understand without seeing the hen, but I am inclined to think that she had a bad case of infection caused by rupturing an egg duct, and that the substances that looked like tumors were egg yolks which had been dislodged and had fallen into the lower body, where they had gradually decayed and infected the flesh, which gave it a dark color. The fact that the embryo eggs still attached were hard or dark in color is almost conclusive evidence that the trouble originated in the egg passage; and possibly, instead of her comb being frozen, the dark color was the result of the progress of the poison through her system.

M. J. A.—In the morning, give one quart of mash made of equal parts of wheat bran and corn-meal and ground oats. Just moisten with hot water, and allow it to cool before feeding. Mash food must never be wet, only moist enough to crumble when thrown down. If the birds are confined to a yard, give sprouted oats, cabbage, or green vegetable of some sort, and half a pint of oats, wheat, or cracked corn scattered in deep litter, at noon. At night, all the whole corn they can eat up clean in ten minutes. Keep sharp grit, oyster shell and water before them all the time.

E. H.—It would be safer to plow the sod ground used last year by chickens that have had roup. Plow or spade, and sow oats or some such crop, which can be used as green food for the birds.

G. H.—I don't know the incubator you refer to. Poor hatches are more frequently the fault of the attendant than of the machine used. Read the poultry department in the January COMFORT, and in this issue also. Some of the points on incubation may help you to better results.

E. M.—I fear the birds are suffering from tuberculosis, but you can only be sure of it by killing, and examining the intestines. If there are any white or yellowish spots on the liver and spleen, there is no doubt that you have to deal with the dreaded disease. Doctoring is useless, for the first symptoms, such as loss of health and strength, are so slight that they are apt to go unnoticed. It is not until the disease has developed into the last stages internally, that such symptoms as swollen joints, which occasionally break and discharge pus, occur and attract attention. The disease is very contagious, being spread in large quantities with every dropping from the infected bird, and as fowl tuberculosis is chronic, and impossible to distinguish without examination of the intestines, the only safe way to banish it from the premises is to kill and burn the entire flock. Plow and plant the ground where the birds have been in the habit of congregating, clean and disinfect the chicken-house and all fixtures. Don't shirk the work if you ever want to keep chickens successfully. Brush the ceiling and walls; scrape off the floor; burn all manure and scrapings, then spray the house with some strong disinfectant and scatter quicklime on the floor. After allowing a few days to elapse, give the ceiling and walls a coat of hot whitewash made with boiling skim-milk; to each pailful add a cup of salt, whiting and powdered glue and half a cup of strong carbolic acid. As far as is known, there is no danger of fowl tuberculosis affecting human beings, but it often attacks cats, dogs, calves and other young animals, so too much care cannot be taken to rid the premises of the germs.

C. I. D.—It is difficult to tell from your description whether the birds have canker or chicken pox, but as the treatment described for the one will answer equaly well for the other, it does not make much difference. Bathe the eyes and face with warm water, then apply a saturated solution of boric acid; repeat every day for a week. Open the bird's beak; if there are no spots or sores on the roof of the mouth, or the throat, it is canker and may develop into roup. Both chicken pox and canker are slightly contagious; you should take precautions to disinfect the house. Read answer to E. M. in this issue.

D. F.—I don't know the address of the incubator you mention; should think your best plan would be to write to the paper in which you saw the advertisement, enclosing stamp for reply, and ask them to send you the address.

LARGEST CHECK EVER DRAWN.—A check for an amount in excess of $70,703,600, the largest single check ever drawn, was paid recently through the New York Clearing House. This check, made by J. P. Morgan & Co., and drawn on the National Bank of Commerce, was in connection with the $75,000,000 bond issue of the Canadian government.

ALTAR 1,000 YEARS OLD DISCOVERED.—The discovery of a community house probably a thousand years old in the pre-historic settlement thirty miles west of Santa Fe was announced by Mrs. L. L. Wilson. She has charge of an archæological expedition of the Philadelphia Museum. A huge sacrificial altar is among the relics in the ruins.

How I Succeeded With My Incubator

Those who keep hens or contemplate doing so will find profitable information in the experiences of some of our poultry-raising subscribers in the use of incubators as told by them in the following letters. These and other letters which we have printed recently were written in response to COMFORT'S offer of prizes, last June, for best articles on "How I Succeeded With My Incubator."

Incubator Versus Hens

I bought an incubator in the spring of 1912. I then had 45 Barred Plymouth Rock hens, I set the machine four times, hatching from 90 to 120 chicks each time. I raised about four hundred of them, using a home-made brooder built from the box in which the incubator came. I bought a special lamp and tank, costing $2.50 and put that in to heat it.

In 1913 and 1914 I hatched and raised about the same number of chicks, although I sold about half of the chicks from three to eight weeks old at 20 to 42 cents each, paying much better than selling them as broilers to the butcher. I sold all my Plymouth Rock pullets for 75 cents each the last of October and kept only thoroughbred Rose Comb Rhode Island Reds. Having only 15 yearling hens of fine enough color, good shape and heavy layers, I could not get enough eggs to set the incubator in 1915 so I used all hens for hatching, setting from March 4 until May 1. I had as many as 20 hens setting at once, using an empty corn crib. With the best of care and constant attention they only averaged nine chicks to the setting. This year I started in with a good flock of 135 hens and 10 fine cockerels, ordered another incubator and set them both Feb. 12, using 22 dozen eggs. March 4 I hatched 209 chicks, March 27 I hatched 115 chicks out of 131 eggs (16 were infertile). I set Silver Campine eggs in the other machine, hatching only 64. The eggs were not fertile—no fault of the machine.

In the new machine April 21 I hatched 139 chicks from 140 eggs. The last of June, 1916 I had hatched 1,255 chicks from six settings. I kept the first two hatches, brooding them in a house nine by eleven feet, heated by a 52-inch hover and coal stove, which cost me $11.85. I have sold the other four hatches, 850 chicks, at 10 cents each when one day old.

I would never attempt to raise chicks again with hens, for you see, with an incubator, I have averaged 13 chicks out of every setting of 15 eggs. These chicks have no lice to contend with. I have the hens laying the eggs they would not if they were setting. With an incubator I can sit in the parlor on cold, stormy days and turn the eggs and not have to be out chasing after old hens that won't stay on the right nest. All the oil it takes to run a machine does not amount to a fraction of the loss in eggs from setting hens. I use my parlor for the incubators and have never hurt a thing in it. While the weather was cold we kept a low fire in the stove with slack to keep the temperature up and save oil. I put a pie pan of water in the 18th day, leave it until the chicks begin coming out. I have a pad made of heavy paper covered with muslin to slide in, leave the chicks in 48 hours and when I take out the chicks and pad the machine is clean and nice as ever, ready to reset. I have never used any disinfectant about the incubator—just dust it out.

Since the first of November I have averaged $60 a month for eggs. This year (1916) until July 1, I sold $400 worth of eggs, day-old chicks, setting eggs and fat roosters, averaging three pounds each, 30 and 25 cents per pound live weight. I have on hand 136 fine young pullets and 125 hens. I am a farmer's busy wife with six cows, large house and three children, but enjoy raising chickens in such an easy way.

MRS. R. S. COWLING, Pa.

All Good Incubators Hatch Well

In our past fifteen years' experience on the farm hatching chickens with incubators we have gleaned much relative to artificial incubation of eggs.

We have handled several makes of standard incubators, both hot air and hot water, and find there is really but little difference in choice. If handled properly, following the directions implicitly, faithfully and regularly, good hatches will generally result. Here is a vital point, no machine can produce good results from poor or degenerate eggs. Eggs should be carefully selected from virile flocks, of known health, active and vigorous.

Fill the incubator with eggs of one size, shape and type. We reject all round or very pointed eggs and all with ridges or roughed, lumpy surfaces.

Generally speaking novices run the heat too high in incubators. A uniform heat (heating the eggs up gradually at first) of from 100 degrees to 102 degrees is better than a higher or much lower heat. A brooder is absolutely indispensable if one is to hatch any considerable number of chickens. We would not now think of raising incubated chicks without them. Incubator chicks in parks by themselves, when such buildings and premises are made sanitary are seldom infested with lice and when fed on dry chick feed and sweet or sour milk make very rapid gains in weight.

We find that the baby chicks must be kept dry and warm and clean. I emphasize it, for this is a most vital consideration in rearing them. After a feed has once been established as noted above, be cautious about changing to other feeds and drinks. If you give them sweet milk at first, continue it and vice versa. Sudden changes of feed or drink are conducive to white diarrhea and other chick diseases. Our experience indicates we make more from our poultry by hatching baby chicks for sale at eight to 15 cents each, when two days old and from broilers, from which we usually receive 18 to 24 cents per pound. We run three large incubators and have usually a good demand from neighbors for the young chickens.

This season we expect more liberal profits from our broilers as by the improved system of Parcel Post and the newer containers, it now makes it both possible, pleasant and profitable for us to ship them to not very distant city markets where, after all expenses are deducted we can realize from five to 10 cents a pound more than we formerly have been getting.

G. A. RANDALL, Mich.

My Advice Is: "Get an Incubator"

To all mothers of the farm and those that are interested in poultry raising and incubators.

I am quite an old hand at the business, 55 years of age and I always used to set hens and raise my chickens, then I thought I had done well if I raised all we could eat and sometimes had 15 or 20 to sell. That was about all I got out of my chickens five years ago.

Then I bought an incubator. Now, instead of selling 15 or 20 birds I sell them by the hundred.

I do not think there is one half of the trouble to run the incubator that there is to run after a lot of old setting hens.

I don't think there is any farm complete without an incubator. I wish every family that has no incubator could step in my yard today and see my chickens. I have 400 which will be ready for the market by July first. Besides I have already sold over 100 chicks. If I could have had an incubator when I was young I would have been all O. K. today. I get more chickens out of my incubator than I do from hens with an equal number of eggs.

Incubator chicks have some lice but nothing like when raised with hens. I keep my hens laying—I do not let them set. I have a pen and when one begins to set I put her up, and in a few days she is ready to lay again. By doing that I have both eggs and chickens to sell all the time.

I wish all women that raise chickens would take my advice and get an incubator and see for themselves what they can make. I have tens of dollars now where I used to have cents.

MRS. ANNIE ALLEN, Okla.

Little Girl Uses Incubator

That incubators are of value, not only among grown-ups but among younger poultry raisers as well, is indicated by this article, telling the experiences of a 13-year old girl. This article, though not among the regular prize winners, was awarded a special prize of $1.—Editor.

We have always had good luck in raising chickens in an incubator. Before we bought our incubator we set hens and we seldom got any more then from four to six chickens out of a dozen eggs. Since we have had an incubator we always have fine chickens and more of them.

An incubator is a great labor saver for when you set your hen you always have to be watching her to see that she stays on her nest.

We had a great experience with a hen. She wished to set so we put fourteen eggs under her. Before it was time for her to hatch she got off and we could not keep her on. She would stay on her nest for a day and the next day she would be off and would not go back any more. The eggs were all spoiled, of course. With an incubator it is a great deal easier even if you do have to watch it so it will be the correct temperature.

It also helps to hatch your chickens earlier so you will have your pullets to lay and have them to sell.

It is better to keep your hens laying and let the incubator do the work for you have your eggs, where otherwise you would not.

One spring before we got our incubator we had set four hens to see if we would have good luck; we set under each of them fourteen eggs, which all together made fifty-six eggs. From the first we got five chickens; from the second, six; from the third, none; from the fourth, nine; which made twenty chickens, so we found that we did not make anything by using hens to hatch. Then we bought an incubator, and now we are raising a great many chickens.

I advise all girls who are raising chickens to use a machine.

The incubator chickens are free from lice and mites, where the chickens that are set under a hen are not.

The incubators are fine workers. People who do not use them ought to try one.

We would never do without one again. We made a great deal of money on the chicks by raising them in an incubator. The money was somewhere around $30.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

while. But some day I'm going to stop building air-castles and dreaming rose-colored dreams and get to making some of them come true. And there's a bright future ahead because I'm not going to let memories of the past blot out the sunshine. Mrs. Wilkinson, of course I would not seriously object to your bringing French heels to my ranch but I shall have to ask you to leave the poodle dog at home. You see I don't fancy women lavishing love and wealth on a dog when there are so many poor little orphans going hungry, for both love and bread.

Sisters, hasn't our dear Mrs. Wilkinson a big, loving, roomy heart? I just love her.

Three cheers for dear old COMFORT, and I will bid you au revoir.

I am eighteen years young now; have had a birthday since last writing to COMFORT.

Your sincere sister, MATTIE MAE CLARK.

Mattie Mae. You talk like a centipede, but a mighty brave, lovable little centipede though, and one that I am proud and glad to welcome to our corner. Come again. Of course you've heard the old joke about the boys who were sent to the country to stay with an uncle because their city home had been threatened with earthquakes. In a few days the uncle telegraphed to their father, "Come and get the boys, send the earthquake," and maybe that is the way you will feel when I come to visit you and bring my family with me. You'll say, "Send the children home, I prefer the poodle dogs," though, honest-to-goodness, Mattie, I haven't a poodle dog and never expect to own one, so that lets me out, doesn't it? Your poem is helpful and I feel sure that you are giving "humanity and God your best" by keeping alive such a cheerful spirit even in the face of difficulties. As I said before, come again. —Ed.

MINERAL WELLS, TEXAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT READERS:

Will you admit into your happy circle a girl from the dear old state of Texas? I have been a reader of COMFORT ever since I learned to read. Everyone in our family loves to read COMFORT. I think that our dear Uncle Charlie, Mr. Gannett, and you, Mrs. Wilkinson, are doing a great work and I am sure there isn't a reader but who will agree with me. I wish it were possible for all of you to visit us in our little Southern town, which is situated in a beautiful valley surrounded on three sides by mountains. There is an abundance of water here, mineral water being the most in evidence. It is obtained at a depth of one hundred and thirty feet, and in inexhaustible quantities. Of course there is plenty of good, fresh water outside the mineral belt. The water for general town use is furnished by an artificial lake. There are many varieties of mineral water, good for different ailments. I have known people to be brought here unable to walk, and perhaps in one month's time they would be climbing the mountains. One sees here almost all forms of deformity and affliction, yet most of the invalids appear cheerful and hopeful. In a town like this strangers are rare, though people are going and coming all the time. Meeting at the drinking counters, where the water is served, people naturally enter into conversation, and everyone gets acquainted. This social feature is very pleasant when one is alone and ill. The home people are always ready to respond to calls for assistance and do all in their power to minister to the needs of those who come here to be benefited. People come here from the extreme North to escape the cold winters, for this is an ideal winter home.

I am with you Virginia Queen, in regard to teaching children there is a Santa Claus. The happiest Christmas I ever had, was when I expected Santa Claus. Some of the sisters seem to think, that we do not realize the real significance of Christmas, when we believe in Santa Claus. Now I think it is just as bad one way as the other, for I have known people who "hooted" at the idea of letting their children believe there is a Santa Claus and the children hardly knew why they were celebrating Christmas, and all in the world the parents thought of was to have a good time. We children always eagerly looked for Santa, but we never forget what Christmas was.

I may come again some day. With best wishes to the COMFORT staff and all its readers,

Sincerely yours, MISS HANCIE MAGEE.

Granny's Old Piano

How It Plays Spirit Music at Night

By Florence Briney Reed

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

PART II.

THE next day in response to her son's question as to the location of the myrtle bed, Mrs. Brand replied:

"Myrtle? There's none nearer than the old Talbut graveyard. I never could abide it in any garden of mine. It's too creepy."

"There's a sight of it up there," Granny interposed. "Sister Lucy always liked it, and we planted it thick on her grave. It's just about taken the whole plot."

"What did Aunt Lucy look like? Was she pretty?" Talbut queried, absently.

"She was a real pretty girl," Granny replied. "She was dark like the Talbuts. You favor them, too, but your sisters are light like your mother's folks. Lucy had such pretty black hair, always in long curls, and she had pretty ways and pretty dresses, for pa always favored her."

Granny was looking through the open doorway across the meadow, where a faint gleam of white in the group of pines on the hill marked the resting place of her young sister. Talbut, respecting the tender reminiscence in her faded eyes, left the room quietly, and Dora moved softly about, putting the room to rights. Presently Granny spoke:

"Some of Lucy's things are here yet, in the old wing. One of these days I'm going to get them out. They haven't had a real good airing for a long time. They're in the horsehair trunk," she added.

All that day a strange feeling of unrest brooded over the house. A special treat had been planned, a trip to the city, with an evening at the theater, with the family's return on the Limited, which stopped at the village at one o'clock in the morning. These little excursions could be enjoyed only when Talbut was at home, as Granny and Dora could not be left alone in the house.

"Tonight," said Talbut, as his Grandmother and Dora turned in from the porch after having said goodbys to the family, "tonight I shall keep a lookout for my dear Aunt Lucy. I am hoping that she will favor us with a few selections."

But Granny turned on him, exclaiming sharply:

"No good ever came of meddling with things you can't understand." And Dora added:

"It might bring you ill luck, Mr. Talbut. Better not sit up. I wouldn't, if I were you."

The evening wore on, and at last Granny and Dora retired, leaving Talbut to sit up and wait for the last train. He made himself comfortable with book and pipe in the library. The house was very still, but outside, a dog howled dismally. The honeysuckle vines, stirred by the rising wind, tapped softly at the window. Just as the hall clock chimed midnight, Talbut roused himself with a start. The last stroke of the bell still tingled in the quiet air, and with it came, faint and far away, familiar ghostly strains from the old piano. He sprang to his feet, determined to unravel the mystery. Realizing that it would be useless to try to go through the house, as the doors were all locked, he softly opened the front door and made his way stealthily around the veranda in the direction of the old wing. The lilac and rose bushes almost completely concealed the tiny windows of the parlor, but stepping carefully between the clumps of ribbon grass and flags bordering the stone walk, he crept up to the wall and pushing aside the branches, he looked within. What he expected to see, he hardly knew, but at the sight which met his eyes, he started back in amazement. The old piano was open, and the moonlight, pouring in silver flood through the west window, revealed the slender figure of a girl in the quaint costume of fifty years ago. Her hands rested lightly on the piano's yellow keys. Long curls of dark hair shadowed her face and fell over her white shoulders; the wide skirts of her flounced gown spread out on either side, and in a flash Talbut thought of Granny's adored sister, the lovely Lucy, who must have dressed just so, and who had been resting on the hill over there beyond the meadow for many years. A strange chill crept through his veins. He stepped back, letting the branches of the lilac spring into place again, as he glanced over his shoulder toward the hill where a mass of black marked the place where the pine trees kept guard over the Talbut graves. When he looked into the parlor windows again, the old room was empty. At that moment a frightened scream broke the stillness—a woman's scream. "Dora's voice!" Talbut said to himself. "She has seen the ghost, too!" Three steps brought him to the old front door, long unused. As he struggled to open it, the scream came again, this time as if half repressed. Exerting all his strength, he forced the door open and entered the room. In a corner, perched unsteadily upon one of the old haircloth chairs, was the figure he had seen at the piano, while across the floor, scampered a big gray rat. The voice was Dora's, and it was Dora whom Talbut caught in his arms, a tremulous, weeping Dora, attired in a muslin delaine gown of war-time pattern. After a few moments she was able to sob out her explanation, and Talbut heard all about the old piano, and the new table; how badly Granny had felt over it and how, knowing the superstitions of the Brand family about the old wing, she had thought up a plan to work upon their fears.

"I haven't put on this dress before," she confessed, "but something you said this morning made me sure that you would watch, and I wanted to make certain that you would never guess who the 'ghost' was. If it hadn't been for that miserable rat, everything would have been all right. But it jumped out all at once when I was going back into the storeroom—and——"

She seemed to have forgotten that Talbut still held her in his arms—her head, with its soft curls, resting on his shoulder. Talbut patted the silken rings gently as he answered:

"Never mind, everything's all right now, and I think it was mighty good of you to take all that trouble for dear old Granny. It must have been pretty spooky to come into this chilly, musty old place night after night. Weren't you afraid someone would find you out?"

"No. I knew they would never think of me, for no one had ever heard me play the piano. The matron's aunt at the Home taught me some old-fashioned pieces, and when Granny spoke about her sister playing them, I thought up my plan. Do you think it was wicked?" she queried anxiously. "I felt so sorry for Granny, and it wasn't as if your family couldn't buy a new table. They did not have to take Granny's old piano."

"No," Talbut replied. "I do not think there was any harm in it, only I believe you ought to tell Granny all about it. What do you suppose she has thought: Yes, Dorry, you must tell her, but the rest need never know."

"Well—if you say so, I will," Dora said, releasing herself shyly from Talbut's arms. "But, oh, once I was really scared! Do you remember the time we found the myrtle spray? I hadn't put it there, and it made me feel very queer. Where did it come from? Do you think a rat could have brought it?"

"Perhaps," said Talbut, with a smile. "But come, Dora, we will go to Granny now, just as you are, and get it over before the family comes home. We will just about have time."

When they reached Granny's room, they were surprised to see a line of light beneath her door. Alarmed, they paused before knocking, but the old lady's voice called out sharply:

"Come right on in. Don't stand whispering out there in the hall."

Opening the door, they found Granny wide awake and dressed. Two candles were burning in brass sconces on the mantel and a tiny fire snapped on the hearth, for the evening had been cool, and Granny always had her fire ready for lighting. The little old lady looked at them without a trace of surprise, and said:

"So you caught her? Humph, I knew you would! You're smart, just like all the Talbuts. You shan't tell on her, now. They don't need to know a thing about this. 'Twon't hurt them to worry a little."

"I'm not going to tell, Granny!" said Talbut, as she fixed her black eyes on him. "But, Granny, you surely didn't know who it was all this time?"

"Of course, I did," Granny replied. "Haven't I just told you the Talbuts were smart? That first night I couldn't quite make it out, but I guessed in a minute, as soon as I caught the 'Maiden's Prayer,' Dora is a good girl, but she can't play the piano like my sister Lucy. The running-up part sounded too jerky and she played the cross-hand place terrible fast. And when I decided it wasn't Lucy, which I ought to have done right away, for it isn't right to believe in spirits, why then I knew it couldn't be anybody but Dora. It was real smart of her, too, and I guess she saved Lucy's piano. That's why I told you about Lucy's old dresses today. I knew it would be just like you to go peeking in on her. The rest of 'em would be too scared to think of it. Stand out here and let me look at you, child! The dress is real becoming!"

Becoming it was, the soft rose-delaine, with its flounces and pointed waist. Dora's curls fell over her rosy cheeks as she leaned over the old lady's chair and questioned softly:

"Do you forgive me for it all, dear Granny?"

"Why, of course," answered Granny. "Didn't I say it was real smart of you? You ought to be a Talbut. They always were up to just such tricks. But now you must run away or they'll be home. I heard the train whistle for the grade a long time ago. But wait till I tell you about the myrtle sprig. I guess you wondered how it got in there, now, didn't you? Well, I put it there myself! I went over to the graveyard one hot afternoon, slipped out the back way while you people were painting the porch furniture. I kept the branch in water in my room till I found a chance to get in there with it. And then I was afraid it would be all dried up to nothing before you found it. Now, Dorry, you run along."

Talbut watched the girl flit lightly down the hall. "She's a darling," he declared, with conviction, and Granny replied: "Darling? To be sure she is. Don't get any foolish notions into your head about her just because she comes from the orphan asylum. You marry to suit yourself, Talbut Brand! The Talbuts all did."

"It's worth thinking over," Talbut said, a twinkle in his dark eyes. "But you'd better be getting to bed now, Granny. And don't worry any more about the piano. I'll buy the family the biggest, shiniest library table I can find, and that old piano shall stay just where it is until Kingdom come."

When Granny was alone again in her firelit room, she smiled wisely and murmured:

"Dorry and Talbut will see that Lucy's piano is taken care of after I'm gone. And I'll give Dorry Sister Lucy's coral set for a wedding gift. I never wanted it to go out of the family, and the others are too fair to set it off."

And so, dreaming sweet prophetic dreams, all of which were destined to be realized in due time, Granny extinguished her candles and fell asleep.

The Wizard Charm

like ye say ye do?"

"An' d'ye s'pose I'd buy a wizard charm to win ye back if I didn't, Denny bhoy?" she murmured, resting her head against his bosom.

"Well, I hate that Polack crature an' I wish she was in ——" but remembering there was a lady present, he didn't say where he wished the radiant Cora.

"R'ally Denny bhoy?" Kathleen asked, her trust quickly returning.

"R'ally an' truly," he returned. "'Tis that giddy she is! An' she thinks that pie-faced guy handsomer'n me!"

Dennis' pride had been sorely tried, and to himself he had to admit that the proprietor of the "Haviland Academy of Society Dancing," was the worthier to carry the palm of beauty.

But Kathleen! She snuggled up against his manly chest and whispered: "Shure, an', I don't see what she could'a seen in that mutt! There ain't none o' em, that's handsomer'n ye are!"

It was the winning stroke.

"We ain't goin' to monkey any more, Kathleen," Dennis announced, "an' we'll be married soon's ye kin git ready!"

"Oh, Denny, I'm thot happy!" and further words were lost in one long kiss.

The Wizard Charm had made good!

Should any subscriber desire an immediate, special opinion on any question privately mailed, it may be had by sending one dollar with a letter asking such advice, addressing as above.

RINGBONE.—I have a very valuable horse, six years old that has ringbone on left hind foot. After it had been growing six months he became very lame. I took a chisel and cut it in two places, and burnt it with a hot iron, after which I used caustic balsam. He is wearing a lead band around ringbone. While he travels much better he is not well. What would you advise me to do? B. G. S.

A.—The cutting treatment was wrong and might have ruined the horse. Blistering was indicated but the ointment too mild. The lead band will do no good. Have a qualified veterinarian properly puncture-fire the ringbone and under it in the hoof and then apply a blister. After that the horse should be kept tied up short for six weeks.

LOCOED CATTLE.—Is there any cure for locoed cattle? A lot of it grows here and we think one yearling has it. H. L. M.

A.—So far as possible the loco weeds should be exterminated by grubbing. Affected cattle must be kept off pasture and fed good hay and other available feed. Fowler's solution of arsenic helps. The dose is one half to one ounce twice daily for an adult animal. Lessen the dose according to age and size.

PILES.—I have a young sow to raise six nice pigs. They grew nicely until two months old and then taken with something like piles. They bleed considerably at first, live in that condition two weeks and die. W.

A.—Irritants such as oat hulls or ground cob in the feed tend to cause this condition. Boiled potatoes may also cause it. Put pigs on milk diet adding wheat middlings and oil meal. Cleanse the protruded parts, bathe with extract of witch hazel and return to place then bring tail down over anus between hind legs and tie it to a strap around body so as to make it prevent return of piles or rectum. Make pigs take active exercise daily.

SWEENY.—I have a mule that has had sweeny in her front shoulder for four months. It has shrunk away. What can I do to cure her? R. B.

A.—Have a veterinarian inject a little tincture of iodine under the skin at several places at the top of the wasted part and then rub downward with the palm of the hand. The injection is done by means of a hypodermic syringe.

FOALS DYING.—I owned two colts from good healthy mares. When they were about three months old they both died, within a few days of each other, and apparently without any cause that I could see. Their mothers and they were out on blue grass pasture every day but were in the barn every night and got red top hay and some whole oats for feed. They had all the pure water they cared to drink. Nothing seemed to ail either of the colts the day when each died; on the contrary they were in splendid condition. The weather was quite warm when they died, but I have often let colts out in such weather without bad effects. Several of my neighbors lost colts in the same way. Some people say they died of bot-fly poisoning while others argue it must have been swamp fever. What do you think caused death? W. P. S.

A.—You give not the slightest clue to what may have been the cause of death. There is no such thing as bot fly poisoning and young foals are not killed by swamp fever, so far as we are aware there would seem to be a possibility of sunstroke.

WOODEN TONGUE.—I have a cow, three years old. Her tongue is swollen hard in the middle, but natural at each end. She chews her tongue and froths at the month, and cannot eat hay. It bothers her to eat grain. She has been like this for four months.

A.—The cow has actinomycosis of the tongue, commonly called wooden tongue. The disease is due to invasion of the tissues of the tongue by the ray-fungus (actinomyces) which also causes lump jaw. The disease is curable. Have a veterinarian scarify the hardened tongue and then swab with tincture of iodine, the application to be repeated two or three times a week. Also have him put the cow on a course of iodide of potash which is a specific remedy for this disease when affecting soft tissues.

WOLF TEETH.—Does a horse have wolf teeth and if so does it cause blindness? (2) Describe wolf teeth and locate them. (3) How can blindness be prevented from that cause?

A.—Some horses have wolf teeth which are insignificant little vestigial teeth representing the seventh or anterior premolar teeth of the upper jaw of the prehistoric horse. They come in just in front of the first premolar teeth of the upper jaw, are entirely harmless, never cause any derangement or disease of the eyes (common erroneous belief to the contrary) and need not be removed. They usually drop out as a horse ages.

WORMS.—Will you tell me what is the matter with my cat? He has a rattling in his throat and vomits up worms. L. D.

A.—To destroy the worms starve the cat for eighteen hours, then give one to two grains of santonin, according to age and size, and follow in one half an hour with a dose of Castor oil in milk. The dose may be repeated in two weeks if thought necessary.

SALIVARY FISTULA.—I have a seven-year-old mare that was cut on barb wire when she was a colt. The cut starts about her ear and comes down her neck just behind the jaw bone. The scar could not be seen when I bought her two months ago. Now there is a slight discharge, just enough to keep the hair around the place matted and a small place about as large as a pencil lead that is sore. R. H. H.

A.—Apparently there is a fistula of the parotid salivary duct and home treatment will do no good. It is possible that a skilled surgeon may succeed in closing the opening by operation.

LAMENESS.—I have a mare that was a little lame when I bought her, last June. I worked her and she became very lame and would hold up her hind leg. The flesh shrunk top of her hip, between hip and rump. She is better when not worked. She swings that leg a very little; it seems stiff in hock joint. Just below the stifle bone in front it seems a little large and is not as soft as the other side. I cannot find any soreness, but if she walks over rough ground she stubs her toe and is more lame. (2) I have a horse that has a lump about four inches long, half way between nostrils and eyes. When I open, a white substance in lumps and thin blood comes out and then it closes up. L. L.

A.—Unfortunately we cannot diagnose mysterious lameness without an examination, but we suspect that a ringbone is present and if so you should have it puncture-fired and blistered by a veterinarian. (2) Lump jaw (actinomycosis) apparently is present. Apply tincture of iodine daily and inject it when the lump opens. This may help a little but an operation by a trained surgeon would be the better treatment.

WORMS.—My cat has white worms, about two inches long and the size of a large common pin. The cat does not stir around and chokes a great deal. R. F.

A.—Starve cat for eighteen hours and then give one to two grains of santonin in a capsule and an hour or so afterward give a dose of Castor oil in milk. Repeat the dose in two weeks if thought necessary.

NASAL GLEET.—I have a seventeen-year-old horse, which, at times, has a running from his nostrils. It has a disagreeable odor. It appears to be a gathering and goes for weeks at a time without running; then it breaks out and runs a while and drys again. B. H.

A.—A diseased molar tooth is the probable cause of the discharge and it should be removed by trephining to be done by a trained surgeon. If a tooth is not the cause pus gathers in a sinus of the skull and that also would require trephining and then flushing out daily with a one per cent solution of permanganate of potash.

DEPRAVED APPETITE.—Will you tell me the cause of my cattle eating horse manure? They are in a good pasture and have all the roughage they will eat. They eat it in the summer-time when on good green pasture. (2) I have a large Shepherd dog that was poisoned by the range riders, about two years ago. We gave him fresh milk and he got over it but grew very poor and has remained so. F. A. H.

A.—Feeding wheat bran freely and also allowing free access to slaked lime and salt often will stop this depraved appetite which also causes the eating of bones, leather and other foreign substances. Precipitated phosphate of lime or bone meal mixed in the feed also helps. (2) Worms may be the cause. Give him two drams of freshly powdered kamala in cream or soup after starving for eighteen hours. Repeat in two weeks if thought necessary.

AZORTURIA.—I have a mare six years old, in good condition, that has what the veterinarian calls azorturia. She is only affected during the late fall and winter months. The attacks come on very suddenly. She begins to walk as though the belly band was too tight, shivers and jerks in her shoulders. If I continue driving her she will lie done. When she is stopped a few minutes she gets so stiff she can't walk. The attack usually lasts from twelve to twenty-four hours. Is there a remedy and how should she be fed? H. C.

A.—If azoturia is present the urine will be the color of strong coffee at time of attack. As the disease is purely due to overfeeding during a spell of illness no attack will come on if you stop feeding grain when there is no work for the mare to do and at such times make her take active exercise. Never let her stand for a single day idle in the stable. She should be allowed a roomy box stall. Keep her bowels active at all times.

COLIC.—I have a horse seven years old that becomes sick whenever he is used. It seems to be a pain in the stomach, and his suffering is misery. When sick he will not eat or drink, but lie down and rise again continually. I. B.

A.—Allow the horse a large box stall when in the stable and bed it with sawdust or shavings if he eats his bedding. Never let the horse stand for a single day without work or active exercise. Feed from a very large box to prevent bolting. Give the drinking water before feeding. Feed whole oats, one ninth part of wheat bran by weight, ear corn, carrots and mixed clover hay. It would be well to have the teeth attended to by a veterinarian.

WEAK SHOULDERS.—I have a mule that has soft shoulders. It doesn't appear to hurt her, only when starting a load when she will throw her head to one side. She is not lame in anyway, and her shoulders are not raw. I. R.

A.—The collar does not fit properly or the tugs are improperly adjusted on the harness. These things should be attended to. Very likely the mule would work well in a humane collar, or wide breast collar.

Comfort's League of Cousins

as if their brains rattle and they are trying to tie them together so they won't lose them. I hope nobody will ever see me with one on my head. And whether you agree with me or not, it is very foolish.

It is just half past nine and the little kiddies are tieing up their hair and getting ready for bed. Pretty soon I will be crawling into my bed. I hope to write to you pretty soon. Your sincere friend,

CECILIA EDMAN.

Cecilia, I had an awful job to read your address. Like ninety-nine out of every hundred people, you make the letter a exactly like an o. Always be careful when writing names and addresses. My street address is Park Place. Now Park Place is a real nice, refined sort of address, but my friends won't let me live on Park Place, they make all their a's into o's and the result is I have to spend my days in Pork Place. You see people will insist on putting me on the hog. Of course I don't care very much how the address is written as long as I get the letters, but only twenty million packages of mail went astray in the U. S. last year, some of it containing thousands of dollars, because people simply would insist on addressing envelopes so illegibly, or so carelessly, that even the lynx-eyed postal officials could not decipher them. I am sorry to hear Cecilia, that a lot of stuck up people live around your neighborhood. I despise stuck up people. We are not cursed with the caste system in this country to the extent that they are in Europe, but believe me we are going to get just as bad a dose of it as they have over there if we are not mighty careful, and it's stuck up people who are responsible for classes and caste. Maria went up to Millbrook, N. Y., a millionaire colony, about fifty miles north of New York, to spend a week one summer a few years ago and she saw much that made her radical, democratic stomach turn over. All around this section are vast estates. Palatial residences, almost exact replicas of the homes of the European nobility dot the landscape. Imported flunkeys in gorgeous liveries, gamekeepers, grooms, stewards, footmen, pages, butlers and other poor, unhappy folk, trying to look half human, and never succeeding, throng these gilded halls. Now if a man wants to put his money into a palatial residence I have no objection. That's his business, but I hate to see him turning thousands of acres of food producing land into pleasure parks and game preserves. That's what they have done in Europe, with the result that thousands of people, yeoman farmers, the backbone of the nation, have emigrated, or gone to the cities to be ground by the factory system into weaklings and degenerates. We do not want to adopt the decadent fads and follies of Europe, but that is just what we are doing. We are duplicating the old World vices and follies, without duplicating any old World virtues. Now that war has hit the old World, vast pleasure estates have been given over to the plow, for food must be had at all costs and genteel hands that never toiled, are tilling fields and making ammunition. I had a letter the other day from a man in Europe and this is what he wrote: "The war has done one good thing. It has made us dispense largely with female household help. Our cook and housemaid we have had to dispense with, and my wife and daughter find it quite easy to do what they once did. It means a saving to us of over fifteen dollars a week." In my friend's family there is another saving, the saving which he did not touch upon, but which to my mind is of far more consequence than the financial saving, and that is the saving of selfrespect. I never could understand why two healthy women living in a modest home, should not be wiling and able to take care of that home, and for that matter should not be compelled to take care of it. In these days of running hot and cold water, telephone service, steam and furnace heat, gas stoves, fireless cookers, electric irons, percolators, chafing dishes, self-basting roasters, mechanical sweepers and vacuum cleaners, why should not the well to do, if they have good health, do a little cleaning and cooking once a day? It is only healthy exercise at the best, and saves self respect as well as money. In the little town Maria visited, in which the newly rich had set up their mansions, there was more excitement when Mr. Goldrocks (who had made a fortune putting sand in sugar, glucose in jam, clay in candy, sawdust in sausages, or turned over five millions by wrecking a railroad, and skinning widows and orphans) went down to the village depot in his new five thousand dollar limousine, than you'll find in a British village if King George the one fifth and Mary the four fifths happened to strike it on a royal progress. It amused me when I was living in a Western town some twenty-five years ago to note how the insidious evils of pride and caste were creeping in. There was a west side where the wealthy lived, and an east side where the toilers existed. There was of course a whole page in the Sunday paper devoted to the doings of high society. All the reports on that page were graded according to a person's social position. If rich Mrs. Jones on the west side had a friend drop in for lunch, that trifling episode was given a whole column in the Sunday paper, while if poor Mrs. Brown over on the east side had two hundred of her neighbors drop in to celebrate her golden wedding, or threw her husband out of the window, or fell down-stairs and broke her neck, she only got three lines. Mrs. Gotrocks who spent her summers in Paris, regarded with unutterable contempt Mrs. Liverwurst who spent her winters in Southern California. There is only one aristocracy in the world, and that is the aristocracy of intellect and character. "Pride," Pope says, "is the never failing vice of fools," and the Lord knows he is right. Pride goeth before destruction and a haughty spirit before a fall, says the grand old Bible. People who carry their noses highest in the air, are generally the ones that spend the butt end of their lives rubbing that same nose against their shoe tops. No really great man ever stuck his nose in the air, for no real gentleman was ever stuck up. Mr. Gould, or Mr. Vanderbilt wouldn't speak to Maria, but the Duke of Buccleuch, the premier Duke of Scotland, would and often did. It is only the parvenu, the newly rich, and the ignoramus, the purse proud and the empty headed who do the stuck up act. We should take honest pride in every worthy action we do, but honest pride never poked a man's nose in the air, rather it made him humble and brought him nearer to God. Abraham Lincoln said he only knew one man who was dignified and he was a jackass. Death levels all ranks and lays the shepherd's crook beside the scepter. Life is too short and eternity too long for little peewee mortals to attempt to lord it over their less fortunate brothers, because luck or rascality or ability has placed a few more dollars in their pockets. I have seen the curse of caste in other lands. Its blighting effect in India is appalling and horrible. The elevated nose and being stuck up are the insidious things which divide society into camps, the world into classes, and make democracy, which is our hope, our sheet anchor, our guiding star, our one salvation, a jest and a byword. Let us be democratic. No one who is truly democratic can ever be stuck up. Unless you are democratic you can never be truly American. Those little ribbons that some girls tie around the forehead is a revival of an old Greek fashion. If a girl has a Grecian type of face, a ribbon around the brow and worn when in the home, is quite becoming. No one however should wear anything on the street that is bizarre or conspicuous. In many cases these ribbons serve a good purpose, for if they do not succeed in keeping the brains from jingling, maybe they keep the mush from spilling. Our fashions are made for us by the wanton women of European capitals, and they are pushed down our throats by the male dressmakers and merchants to boom business, and anything that booms business even at the expense of all that we hold sacred and most dear, must not be interfered with, at least not until we get more sense, more decency and more self respect.

RUTHERFORDTON, N. C.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for some time and have received much valuable information from its columns.

Uncle, would you mind doing me a favor? I am sending you nine words and want you to write me a few short verses, using them as a guide. The following are the words: "I'll Never Love No One Like I Do Him." Am sending a two cent stamp and a stamped envelope for answer.

Hope you won't think I am asking too much. I have a great desire to be a poet, but am going to school and haven't the time to spare at the present. Hoping to hear from you at once I am,

Your friend, UYLESS HINES.

P. S. Uncle please excuse this paper as I am in school and haven't any stationery here.

Thank you Uyless, for your brief but important letter. Please ask your teacher to reconstruct your handwriting. People who write a slanting, tumbledown back hand, as though all the letters were stewed, jingled, jagged, pickeled and inebriated, too befuddled to stand up and all trying to see a resting place on their backs, make me weary. This style of handwriting I regard as a decided evidence of decadence. It is as objectionable as the futurist's idea in painting and art. With what charming frankness and candor does Uyless inform us that he has not time to be a poet. Perhaps we can thank kind Providence for that, but a school boy who has not time to write a legible hand ought to be spanked. Paper is scarce and horribly expensive, so don't waste any valuable material by sprawling one or two letters across the entire page, and don't make the letter f look as though it were a y. Not having time to be a poet you are going to hire me to do your poetizing for you. I thank you for your

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

In order to meet the demand for information made by COMFORT subscribers on the kindred subjects of Etiquette and Personal Appearance, this column will be devoted to them, and all questions will be answered, but no inquirer shall ask more than two questions each month. We would suggest to readers to cut this column out and paste it in a scrap book. Address letters to Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Want-to-know, Altus, Okla.—The wedding ceremony prescribed by the church is not quite that of the ceremony by a magistrate, though the magistrate can vary his to suit the circumstances, while the clergyman cannot. The result, however, is just as binding. If the couple wish to be married with a ring, any polite magistrate is perfectly willing to perform the ceremony accordingly. The wedding ring cannot very appropriately be had unless there is a wedding, without regard to the length of the engagement.

A. G., Sylvatus, Va.—You might give the young lady a nice little gilt-edged volume of etiquette so that she could acquire better manners than she has and then tell her good by. Really, if you are at all sane, you will pay no more attention to the young lady. She either wants to snub you, or she lacks the ordinary sense of politeness. Why bother with that sort when there are others so much more attractive? However, there are no rules of etiquette to prevent your being snubbed all over if you like that sort of thing.

Gray Eyes, West Baden, Ind.—When strange men in a buggy halloo at two ladies on the road, the presumption is that they are not gentlemen and the ladies should ignore them unless they wish to make the acquaintance of that kind of men. (2) A lady may permit a gentleman to wear her ring, but she will have a more contented mind if she does not. (3) A girl of fifteen may walk home from a party with a gentleman if some member of her own family is not there to look after her. Girls of fifteen should not go to parties unattended.

Tenn. Beauty, Mt. Airy, Tenn.—An engaged couple should talk about something else besides themselves, but they seldom do, so that when they are married and the previous subject is stale, they haven't anything else to talk about and home gets mighty dull as a conversation center. But engaged couples rarely learn this soon enough. (2) Etiquette hasn't much to do with lovers' manners, but it strikes us that if a gentleman told a lady continuously for a year that he loved her with all his heart, he should, at least, incidentally, mention the subject of marriage. Still, some do not and the lady must settle the question to suit herself. In the mean time, the gentleman has no right to put his arm around the lady and kiss her. This is another matter which the lady, not etiquette, controls. Some ladies do and some don't.

Rosie, Rainier, Cal.—Don't worry. You did not lie, you only suppressed the truth to prevent harm, and society excuses that as choosing the lesser of two evils. You acted properly in telling the truth where the truth was what should have been told. Conventional lying, as practised in social circles, is a somewhat complicated proposition and before you attempt a general practise of it you should have a talk with your pastor.

Lady, Pleasant Plain, Iowa.—In giving presents of any kind, the sensible and proper thing is to find out what the prospective recipient would like. It may be useful, or it may be ornamental, but if it is what is wanted, the success of the gift is assured. Many of the city stores now advertise to find out what persons want, and they notify the donor and supply the gift and deliver it. All the donor has to do is to pay for it and the price may be large or small as the donor advises the store people in submitting a list of presents to select from. (2) It is not exactly conventional for a lady to mend a gentleman's clothes, even though she can do it better than his relatives can, but it is a friendly act and should be recognized as humane good manners. Still, a tailor might have done the work better than the lady could.

Lassie, Knoxville, Tenn.—In accepting a gentleman's invitation in writing, don't be formal, but write it as you would answer him over the phone, or if you met him anywhere. A lady should not receive an invitation if she doesn't know how to answer it. Also, you should say "acceptance," not "acception," which is a word too old-fashioned for any use now. (2) The lady leads the way into her own house, though her escort may open the front door if he can do it as easily as she can.

Perplexed, Auburn, Wash.—It is "legal and practical" in some states for second cousins to marry, but the wisest people choose to marry outside of their own families. A state might make a law legalizing the marriage of a brother and sister, but the law wouldn't make it right. However, so many second cousins do marry that if you want to, no legal or practical objections can be made.

Brown Eyes, Butte, Mont.—Sometimes there is harm in a girl marrying a man ten years older than herself and sometimes not. It depends on the girl and the man, not the age. There is no harm in a girl of seventeen going with a man of twenty-four, if she resolves not to marry him till she is twenty-one, which would make them both of the very best marrying age. P. S. You have our congratulations upon your ability to do the housework for eight people. It is far more to your credit than being able to smoke a cigarette and dance the Toddle. Also that your letter is written without an error of any kind.

P. M. S., St. Joseph, Mo.—Do not give the cold shoulder to the young man until you know why he did not call when in the city, as he promised to do. If he is as nice as you say he is, he must have a good reason for not keeping his promise. Don't lose your temper and a nice young man both at once.

Florence, Denison, Texas.—A girl of twenty-four and a man of thirty-six are at a very good age to marry. (2) You cannot permanently remove hair from your face by merely pulling it out, for it will grow again.

K. R., Prairie View, Kans.—There is nothing improper in meeting your young man at the front gate which is beside the hogpen, but the front gate is no place for the hogpen unless that is the style for front gates in Prairie View. Of course, when you are in Rome you must do as the Romans do, for there is nothing like being in the fashion. If the young man drinks only enough to see ghosts and not snakes, he might be worse—but not much.

Discouraged, Mt. Vernon, Ind.—All three of you are in the wrong to some extent. First, you were wrong in saying anything about your friend which could be retold to his hurt, and the young lady was worse for telling what you had said and causing trouble. The friend was wrong in writing you an ill-natured letter when he should have talked to you if he wanted to take any notice at all of what you had said, and you added to the first of your wrong-doing by writing ugly letters to your friend and to the young lady. You did your part in trying to remedy the wrong by apologizing to the young lady and if she does not see fit to be polite to you, let it go. In any event, if you never get a chance to talk to her again, she will not have a chance to make trouble by repeating what you say. We think if the three of you got together and had an apology party the social atmosphere would be considerably cleared. Mail this copy of COMFORT to the young lady.

Curly, Goldsmith, N. Y.—Getting rid of undesirable acquaintances without hurting their feelings is one of the social problems which thus far has never been so successfully solved as to fit all cases. Work it out for yourself.

Oklahoma Boy, Boley, Okla.—A girl is a debutante when she has had her coming-out party and is admitted into society, and she is a debutante for one season. (2) We do not think there is too much talk about the danger to which young girls are exposed, not only in the cities, but in the country. We happen to be in touch with sources of information on this subject from all parts of the country and we know that there should be not only more talk on the dangers, but more action to prevent them. The most serious aspect of the case is that the girls themselves are careless of the dangers, not ignorant of them in most cases, and are willing to take the most dangerous risks just to have a good time as they call it in all sorts of giddy company. More respectable girls drink cocktails, smoke cigarettes and keep late hours in these days of modern ideas than was ever known before and parental restraint has been greatly relaxed in favor of social demands which undermine the health and the morals of the young of both sexes. Who is to blame for these conditions is a question many organizations, religious and social, are engaged in studying, but the solution has not yet been found.

Subscriber, Annona, Texas.—Engaged couples may kiss each other with perfect propriety, even if the date of the wedding has not been fixed.

Patt, Steubenville, Ohio.—You are doing the proper thing, young fellow, in trying to inform yourself somewhat on social usage before attempting social practise. Too many young fellows don't and their company manners are worse than those of Indians. We are glad you have found the girl you like and we hope you marry her, but don't think of it until after you are twenty-one, when you will be recognized legally as a grown man, though you should wait four years longer before you marry. Of course when you take her home, you must go into the house if she asks you, but you mustn't stay later than ten o'clock, or not so late if you have to get up very early. You do not sit on the same chair with her, at least, in the beginning, but you both may occupy a cozy sofa, or one of those double chairs built for two. If she likes candy you may begin giving it to her as soon as you please, but it isn't necessary to feed her on it, nor is it necessary to be everlastingly spending your hard-earned savings on her for movies and that sort of thing. Be liberal, but not lavish. If you go to see her Saturday and Sunday that will be plenty to start with. One of the mistakes young people make is seeing too much of each other and now that you are just beginning, you should get a fair start. Of all things, don't be in a hurry to get married, or the chances are that you will be in more of a hurry to wish you hadn't. Keep a level head and see that the girl's head is even leveler than yours. A fool girl is worse than a fool young man. You have our best wishes for a brilliant social success.

The Masked Bridal

dard stood before her.

But she shrank back almost immediately, a low exclamation of surprise escaping her as she saw his face, so white, so pain-drawn, and haggard.

"Gerald! what is the matter?" she demanded, forgetting, for the moment, her own anger and even her errand there, in the anxiety which she experienced for him.

"I am feeling quite well, Anna," he responded, in a mechanical tone. "What is it you wish to say to me?"

Sweeping into the room, she closed the door after her, then confronted him with accusing mien.

"What do I wish to say to you?" she repeated, her voice quivering with passion, her eyes blazing with a fierce expression. "I want that paper which you have stolen from me."

"I—I do not understand you, Anna," the man began, in a preoccupied manner. "What paper—what——"

"I will bear no trifling," she passionately cried, interrupting him. "You know very well what paper I refer to—I never had but one document in my possession in which you had any interest; the one you have so beset me about during the last few weeks."

"That?" exclaimed the man.

"That!" retorted his companion, mockingly imitating his tone, "as if you did not very well know it was 'that,' and no other. Gerald Goddard, I have come to demand it of you," she went on shrilly. "You have no right to enter my rooms, like a thief, and steal my treasures! I——"

"Anna, be still!" commanded her husband. "You are losing control of yourself, and some of our guests may overhear you. I know nothing of the document."

"You lie!" hissed the woman, almost beside herself with mingled rage and fear. "Who, but you, could have any interest in the thing? who, save you, even knew of its existence, or that it had ever been in my possession? Give it back to me! I will have it! It's my only safeguard. You knew it, and you have stolen it, to make yourself independent of me."

"Anna, you shall not demean either yourself or me by giving expression to such unjust suspicions," Gerald Goddard returned with cold dignity. "I swear to you that I do not know anything about the paper. I have not even once laid my eyes upon it since you stole it from me. If it has been taken from the place where you have kept it concealed," he went on, "then other hands than mine have been guilty of the theft."

"Then who could have taken it," she gasped, growing ghastly white at the thought of there being a third party to their secret—"who on earth has done this thing?"

Gerald Goddard was silent. He had his suspicions, suspicions that made him quake inwardly, as he thought of what might be the outcome of them if they should prove to be true.

"Gerald, why do you not answer me?" his companion impatiently demanded. "Can you think of any one who would be likely to rob us in this way?"

"Have you no suspicion, Anna?" the man asked. "Was there no one among your guests tonight, who——"

"Who—what——!" she cried.

"Was there no one present who made you think of—of some one whom you—have known in the—the past?"

"Ha! do you refer to Mrs. Stewart?" said madam. "Did you also notice the—resemblance?"

"Could any one help it?—could any one ever mistake those eyes? Anna—she was Isabel herself!"

"No—no!" she panted wildly, "she may be some relative. Are you losing your mind? Isabel is—dead."

"She lives!"

"I tell you no! I—saw her dead."

"You? How could that be possible?" exclaimed Mr. Goddard, in astonishment. "We were both in Florence at the time of that tragedy."

"Nevertheless, I saw her dead and in her coffin."

"Now you talk as if you were losing your mind."

"I am not. Do you not remember I told you one morning, I was going to spend a couple of days with a friend at Fiesole?"

"Yes."

"Well, I had read of that tragedy that very day, and then hid the paper, but I did not go to Fiesole at all. I took the first train for Rome."

"Anna!"

"I wanted to be sure," she cried, excitedly. "I was jealous of her, I—hated her; and I knew that if the report was true I should be at rest. I went to the place where they had taken her. Some one had cared for her very tenderly—she lay as if asleep, and looked like a beautiful piece of sculpture in her white robe; one could hardly believe that she was—dead. But they told me they were going to—to bury her that afternoon unless some one came to claim her. They asked me if I had known her—if she was a friend of mine. I told them no—she was nothing to me; I had simply come out of curiosity, having seen the story of her tragic end in a paper. Then I took the next train back to Florence."

"Why have you never told me this before, Anna?"

"Why?" she flashed out jealously at him. "Why should I talk of her to you? She was dead—she could never come between us, and I wished to put her entirely out of my mind, since I had satisfied myself of the fact."

"Did—did you hear anything of—of——"

"Of the child? No; all I ever knew was what you yourself read in the paper—that both mother and child had disappeared from their home and both were supposed to have suffered the same fate, although the body of the child was not found."

"Oh!" groaned Gerald Goddard, wiping his brow. "I never realized the horror of it as I do at this moment, and I never have forgiven myself for not going to Rome to institute a search for myself; but——"

"But I wouldn't let you, I suppose you were about to add," said madam, bitterly. "What was the use?" she went on, angrily. "Everything was all over before you knew anything about it——"

"I could at least have erected a tablet to mark her resting-place," the man interposed.

"Ha! ha! it strikes me it was rather late then to manifest much sentiment; that would have become you better before you broke her heart and killed her by your neglect and desertion," sneered madam.

"Don't, Anna!" he cried, sharply. Then suddenly straightening himself, he said, as if just awaking from some horrible nightmare: "But she did not die. I have not that on my conscience, after all."

"She did—I tell you she did!" retorted the woman.

"But I have seen and talked with her tonight, and she told me that she was—Isabel!" he persisted.

"I do not believe it—I will not believe it!" she panted.

"Anna," he said, gravely, and speaking with more calmness and gentleness than at any time during the interview, "this is a stern fact, and—we must look it in the face."

His tone and manner carried conviction to her heart.

She sank crouching at his feet, bowing her face upon her hands.

"Gerald! Gerald! it must not be so!" she wailed. "It is only some cunning story invented to cheat us and avenge her. That woman shall never separate us—I will never yield to her. Oh, Heaven! why did I not destroy that paper when I had it? Gerald, give it to me now, if you have it; it is not too late to burn it even now, and no one can prove the truth—we can defy her to the last."

The man stooped to raise her from her humiliating position.

"Get up, Anna," he said, kindly. "Come, sit in this chair and let us talk the matter over calmly. It is a stern fact that Isabel is alive and well, and it is useless either to ignore it or deplore it."

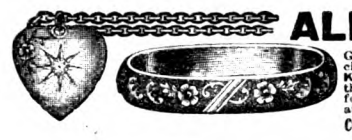
"You say that it is a 'stern fact' that Isabel lives," she remarked, with compressed lips.

"I am sure—there can be no mistake," the man replied. Then he told her of the interview which had occurred in the hall, where he had found the woman standing before the picture which he had painted in Rome so many years ago.

"She recognized it at once," he said; "she located the very spot from which I had painted the scene."

"Oh, I cannot make it seem possible, for I tell you I saw her lying dead in her casket," moaned madam.

"She must have been in a trance—she must have been resuscitated by those people who found her. As sure as you and I both live, she is living also."



"Oh, how could such a thing be?"

"I do not know—she did not tell me; she was very cold and proud."

"What was she doing here? how dared she enter this house?" cried madam, her anger blazing up again.

"I cannot tell you. It was a question I was asking myself just as you came to the door," said Mr. Goddard, with a sigh. "I have no doubt she had some deep-laid purpose, however."

Comfort Sisters' Corner

WARRENSBURG, MO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

In the December number there seemed to be quite an argument as to whether or not children should be taught to believe in Santa Claus. It is one of the sweetest memories of my childhood and I am glad now that my parents "fooled" us about the dear old saint. He was as real to me as were the relatives across the water, and I really loved him more than I did my unknown relatives of noble German blood.

I have two children, young men now, yet they talk of the times when "Sandy Claus" used to come with his reindeers and sleigh. The oldest, twenty-one, has been a soldier for almost four years and at this writing is on the Mexican border and don't you forget, dear sisters, that old St. Nick found him Christmas just as he did when he was a boy, and will continue to find him as long as his mother has any interest in Christmas, and I think that will be as long as I live.

I always told them stories or read to them and I often think of the difference in the stories told to them and those told to me when I was a child. In a sod house, on a western Kansas claim, our parents told us old German legends, weird and uncanny, about witches, ghosts, curses and spells sent on people, tokens and haunted houses, stories that made the most delicious shivers creep up and down our spines. Our neighbors were few and far between but they would meet one night at our home and then some other place and tell and retell those stories which are still fresh in my memory and there have been times when I would have given all I possessed to have been a child again and hear my parents tell me tales of long ago. J. B.

J. B. It is fortunate for your children that the stories you told them were different from those your parents told you. A child's mind is so susceptible that blood-curdling stories, superstitions and fears instilled then have a lasting effect and, indeed, some children never outgrow their influence. Children are so trusting that they are inclined to believe everything an older person tells them and even take seriously things told as a joke and with the imagination of childhood unconsciously magnify everything until small terrors assume alarming proportions. No stories at all are better than the wrong kind of stories. —Ed.

RUNGE, R. R. 3, TEXAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I enjoy the COMFORT sisters' letters very much.

I cannot agree with Miss B. on the subject of dancing, I suppose it's my raising.

I certainly enjoyed California Voter's letter in December COMFORT. I believe with her exactly, also Mrs. W. M. Reynolds' letter, and wasn't Uncle Charlie's talk in November COMFORT fine?

Mrs. Wilkinson if my letter is not too long may I quote what I read in a woman's paper lately? "There is one point of view that the man who votes seldom sees without her (women's) guidance. In the states where women do not vote, the minimum "age of consent" is according to the law, ten years; in the suffrage states it is sixteen years. The first law made by a woman was the bill introduced in the Colorado legislature by Mrs. Carrie Clyde Holly, raising the age of consent in that state to eighteen years and under certain circumstances to twenty-one years. So you see why the Denver politicians proposing to reopen their red light district were a little uneasy about the outcome. They wanted to pass a bill providing for a 'segregated district:' they were feeling really sanguine when they had 'seen' thirty-six members of the House. There was one member they made no attempt to 'see.' Indeed they went the other way whenever they saw her coming. But they reassured each other: 'She'll be absent from her seat the day the bill comes up. A woman of course, wouldn't wish to be present.' Wouldn't she? She wouldn't be Agnes Riddle then. And the Colorado Legislature knows Agnes Riddle better now. On that day when the promoter of the Byles' bill had made his neat little speech, over there in the seat they had counted on having vacant, Mrs. Riddle rose. And in her own words she 'let them have it.' And what she said was 'a plenty.' 'You gentlemen aren't going at this matter right,' she said, 'why shut the gates of hell on the women of a red light district and leave the men who put them there free to roam around in respectable society? But I will vote for your bill, if you'll amend it to include also a segregated district for fallen men. Only how many of you would be left here in your seats in the State House? I defy any of you who is without sin to cast the first vote against these poor fallen women!' They took the ballot on the Byles' bill. Only one vote, that of the man who introduced it, was recorded in favor of the bill. In the awkward silence of a sudden adjournment, one man after another, as they filed out, whispered to his neighbor, 'She killed it.' After all, the woman who votes can always count on the chivalry of the American man."

Now I must close and tend to my babies. I have three.

Let me hear from one and all. Best wishes to Mrs. Wilkinson and all. An interested reader,

MRS. C. A. GARDNER.

HOBSON, TEXAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I am sitting before a huge fireplace—no, not steam heat,—wholly engrossed in your letters.

The most important aim in my life is to raise my children in the fear and love of God.

I think dancing all right when the girls are chaperoned and then, be careful. The girl untrusted dancing shouldn't be trusted at church meeting. I know for I am "much like an owl." "Kissing" parties? What are they? Some "sister" mentioned them. The appellation sounds opprobrious.

I am an advocate of white Woman Suffrage only, but as Texas is a delinquent when it comes to Women's Rights, I fear our efforts will be ineffectual for a long time hence. The state of Georgia doesn't want Woman Suffrage as the black women outnumber the white. Good thought for Georgia, I'm surprised too since that is the state that cherishes the slanderous remarks of a church defiler, Tom Watson and now comes "the convent inspection bill," besmirching the fair name of these "martyrs in black" compelling an invasion of the sanctity of their homes. When some years back, Georgia was laboring under the yellow fever plague, 'twas the sweet, kind nuns, who had repudiated the world's ways that voluntarily ministered alike to the afflicted protestant and Catholic. Should ever Veasey or Watson "and family" need the help of the nuns they would gladly go, as if no word in vilification of them was ever uttered.

"Georgie" of Springfield, Mass. says: "I will not describe country conditions as most of you know what they are." We do not, if your description is correct. However country sisters, let your distress of mind be alleviated in realizing that Georgie's opinion is in the minority. 'Tis true the city excels the sparsely populated country in some of its schools, yet we who live where Georgie would not, cannot, like the ancient Arab, just "fold up our tents" and "silently steal away" to—say Springfield, Mass. leaving our means of existence and the coyote to be the lone vigil o'er the silent yet heretofore tilled land, just to give our little ones an education and moral training. They would on a large scale, have to help earn their bread, and on the average would be "school absentees" more often than if they were "living next to nature" e'en though a little school going is compulsory.

As for the country children's eyes daily witnessing the grosser things of nature that Georgie alludes to. I say "do you know whereof you speak?" Keep your little ones under your eyes and they will not wander where God intended they should not. Probably the facilities for enclosing or housing your stock were rather awkward or too near your house. Therein lies one cause. If children are made to obey, they will not "see" so much, howsoever observant they be. If we live in town we are content to keep them in one house and lot. 'Need we allow them freedom of the stock pens or a pasture for their playground in the country? It is dangerous as they are prey for some wild animals. Do not try to hold the city children's moral standing above those of the country children. I was born and raised in the country. When my mind began to unfold to the graver studies of nature, it was a city school child, much younger than I, who rushed into my room and imparted ideas the small girls discussed at school. I sent her to her mother with her disastrous tales. I tell this for an instance, not that I think country children's morals excel the city child. My mind is a trifle broader than to allow such a conviction intoxicate me. If my opinion is an "exception" then I think the "exceptions" are in the majority. Do not be disillusioned into thinking I regard the city as a voluptuous monster; that I would be frightened at the thought of rearing my children therein. I am confident I'd succeed in my deliberate determination to win the good, should I go to the city to live. I do not allow my little ones to be exempt from my power of control. I would like to be as a Mother Superior is over her brood. Your distorted opinion, Georgie, I attest to ignorance of real country life. In my opinion a child will mold as it was trained. Under excellent tutorship, one may occasionally fall, yet more often 'tis otherwise.

Miss Eloy Scott, we all know possibly, about Archbishop St. Nicholas, patron saint of Russia. Because his good works were legion and the doctrine of some of his contemporaries, opposed that of materialistic views (in so far as they thought "the manna of St. Nicholas" still flows from his bones healing all kinds of sick). All through the centuries following and because his day is the 6th of December is no reason we teach our children "heathenism" or to tell an untruth when we tell them of Santa Claus (St. Nicholas) as the bearer of toys. For generations back my connections reveled at the approach of Christmas and "Santa" with his toys. I was exultant in childish glee many Christmas nights o'er the "old St. Nic," just as I was o'er the mythical stories I read. When I reached the age of understanding I rejoiced at seeing those less wiser revel at his approach. Really as I read C. C. Moore's "'Twas the night before Christmas" to my children this last Yuletide, and watched their eyes sparkle, spellbound I too, felt "the fairy's wand." I know of no home surrounding that doesn't link Santa's gifts with the birth of Christ. Come to my house any Christmas I am able to have gifts and at the base of our tree, 'mongst the moss and candles will be seen a stable of Christ, St. Joseph and Mary, the Wise Men with gifts for the Babe, etc. Glance to the top of the tree and you will readily observe the glorious Star of Bethlehem that guided the shepherds to where He lay. My children, very small, will tell you the story. Come and we will attend Midnight Mass on Christmas eve, something so beautiful and suggestive,—and church on Christmas Day. There all seems to whisper, "'Tis the birthday of our Lord and Savior." Would that by His cross He could redeem the world!

Mrs. Wilkinson, God bless you, your advice is always needed. Would that threee quarters of us were as broad minded and generous as you are. May the dove of peace alight on London and Berlin towers in 1917 and if not, may we not want for bread because of it. May each and all have many joys and God's help in bringing up children to be model men and women. To accomplish that end is my prayer.

Yours sincerely, MRS. SUE LORENZ JOHNSON.

Mrs. Johnson. In Miss Scott's talk on Santa Claus I feel positive she had in mind that idea solely and did not mean to reflect unpleasantly on the Catholic or any other religion, as so many of the sisters seemed to think and I have had to reject one or two good letters this month because the writers stated their religious preferences so strongly. All creeds are equally welcome but don't you think it a better plan to take the Golden Rule for the Sisters' Corner religion and reserve our own particular denomination for some other time and place?—Ed.

REEDS, R. R. 3, MO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I am writing in answer to our editor's request to hear from some of the sisters on the "married fifty years and never quarreled people," in the November issue of COMFORT following Mrs. Thixton's letter. I have not been married fifty years but have nearly twenty and can truthfully say we have never spoken a cross word to each other and it is not hard to do if one will try. First you must have the love, to forgive, and control of your own temper, and remember one's self is not perfect always. Remember that others see as many faults in us as we do in them.

One thing that often causes trouble between young married folks and that is going to live with parents, of either side. I tried that and know how one has to do. While you are new to them you will do very well but after a while you cannot do anything to please them. They will say hard things to you and treat you in a way that will cause many a heartache and many a bitter tear, so I would advise all young couples not to live with the "in-laws" on either side, but go to housekeeping by yourselves if you have to start with only a camping outfit.

And you that are mother-in-laws, remember that your daughter-in-law is young and not as experienced as yourself, so help and advise her instead of making light of her efforts in trying to do her best.

I hope someone will be benefited by my letter. I have taken COMFORT sixteen years.

MRS. NETTIE MCCLURE.

WALKER, MINN.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT ever since I could read and my parents had taken it many years before that. It is the most welcome paper that comes to our home.

We have a forty-acre farm in Cass county, the land of "clover," as it is called. This is cut-over timber land, and is splendid for all farming purposes, raising chickens and live stock; besides many kinds of small fruit do well here. There is an abundance of wild fruit, strawberries, raspberries and blueberries, etc., besides plenty of timber for wood, and fine fishing lakes. Cass county has taken first prize for the central section of the state for two years now at the state fair. It is not settled very thickly here, as it is a new country and we find it a little lonely at times.

As others describe themselves I will do so too. I am twenty-four years old, five feet six inches tall and weigh one hundred and fifteen pounds, blue eyes and dark brown hair. We have been married six years and have a boy that was five years old in February. Such a fine, big, mischievious lad, and as there are no other children near us it keeps me busy trying to find something to amuse him. I dress him warm and he plays outside every day that it is not too cold and stormy.

There seems to be a good bit of difference in opinion on large or small families. I think there should be as many children as one can care for, and bring up well and healthy. I have seen too many sickly, dragged out, and over-burdened mothers caring for children far beyond their strength or worldly means. The children themselves usually are puny and unhealthy and their parents unable to give them sufficient education to prepare them for their struggle for existence. Being one of a very large family I know something of its advantages and disadvantages and my parents were very hard working people, too.

One thing I never see mentioned in the sisters' letters is the matter of swearing and using other bad language in the home—yet this is too often the case in one half the homes in the country, and town also. The father will usually forbid the boys swearing, yet he will make free use of all the oaths known to man in his general talk before the children from the time they are old enough to understand words at all. It becomes a general part of their education. When people sow oaths and wild words they need not expect but what they will reap them years after in return and it is not a desirable harvest to think of.

Emma Stockinger, I think you are unjust in your criticism to those who do fancy work and tatting. I can think of no more pleasant picture than my dear mother sitting down to rest with her busy tatting shuttle flying, or her knitting needles; she always knit socks, stockings and mittens for a large family and I never knew her to sit down idle. How much better to take up a piece of useful and pretty crochet than to sit and gossip. Fancy work of all kinds is advocated in convalescing hospitals where patients find time hangs heavily on their hands as it keeps their minds busy and healthy, where otherwise they would be idle and liable to be thinking too much on past ills. I know several women who make a fair little income with needlework and do all their house work besides.

After an operation three years ago I began to learn crochet, tatting and knitting and do all three and I do not think I have lost the least bit of interest in the affairs of the present day and reading good books also. Dickens is my favorite author, but I like Scott, Victor Hugo and Fenimore Cooper's "Leather Stocking Tales." I have read and enjoyed most all of the late popular authors, but Dickens is my dear old stand by. We have a very good Carnegie library here in town and I often take advantage of the privilege of good reading.

I would like to hear from some of the sisters living in California in the warm, dry belt; also in the dry regions of Washington, Idaho and northern Arizona. I have muscular rheumatism and bronchitis and want to go where it is warm and dry most all the year. We do not want to sell our home here as we are just starting to pay for it, but I would like to go West first and see how things are before we make any permanent change. Would be glad for information about the climate, crops, price of land and the chances of earning a living. As my health is poor I cannot handle a large correspondence, but would be glad to hear from a few in these localities that are favorable for asthma and rheumatism.

If any of the girls I worked with in Chicago at Kellog's Electric should see this would be glad to hear from them, especially Anna Sheehan, Anna Dyer, Lillie Heidel or Margaret Egan.

Wishing success to all COMFORT's sisters and Uncle Charlie, I am a friend of all.

MRS. OLIVE (WARREN) ANWAY.

FINDLAY, OHIO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I cannot keep still but must speak out in meetin' for Georgie's letter in the December COMFORT is the limit, when she discusses country and city life as she views it.

Now I am a farmer's wife from head to toe, and am proud of it, and I am proud of my big farmer husband. We live in the northern part of Ohio in the great oil- and corn-producing section on a 95-acre farm. Nothing suits my John (or Ben, as it really is) and I so well as the farm. We love it! And now what would our city cousins, like Georgie, do if it were not for the farmers? We raise the wheat for the flour they eat, the beef, pork, mutton, veal, poultry, apples, vegetables and everything else that they must have to exist.

The very reason Georgie did not like the country was because they had no success. It is hard work, long hours and rather lonesome, but you are so free and the neighbors are so friendly, which they are not in the city. How many of your neighbors, Georgie, bring you fresh meat when they have a big supply or come in and do your work or wait on you if you or any of your family are ill? One of our neighbors, a poor man with a small family, was burned out, saving only a few of their household goods. The neighbors clubbed together and got them yards of toweling, muslin, calico, gingham, sheets, pillows, with slips, blankets, quilts, pictures and dishes, furniture, cooking utensils and even clothes. Do you think your city neighbors would do that for you if your home were to burn? No! No!

About country children being vulgar, my nieces and nephews (save one) are all farmer children and I defy you to find any better behaved or more innocent youngsters than they are. And our schools are being centralized, therefore they will be as good as city schools. But Georgie is the first person I ever heard say that city children were more innocent than our country children. For an example: A family from the city moved into our neighborhood and their little eight-year-old girl went to our school, and the things she told our children! The very lowest and vilest things you ever heard of. I presume that is city innocence.

There are but few renters in this section as nearly all the farmers own their farms; have gas for fuel and lights, hot and cold water system, with bath, and there is an automobile in nearly every home. With all those comforts and telephone and rural mail delivery, what more can you ask for?

No, you'll never make a success of the farm unless you like it and have a large store of ambition.

Our yards are as clean and velvety as your front lawns, Georgie, but of course everything is not like this in every place in the country; neither is it in the city, for there are extremes everywhere. But you seldom see a home quarantined in the country. Did you ever notice that?

Excuse me if I have hurt anyone's feeling but I must express my opinions.

I am five feet, six inches tall, weigh one hundred and forty-two pounds, have dark brown hair, large blue eyes and light complexion. I have been married ten years to one of the best "Johns." I am sorry to say we have no family but am wishing that some day the stork may visit our home.

We take a number of papers but COMFORT is the best one.

May I come again?

Love to Mrs. Wilkinson and all the sisters,

COUNTRY JAKE.

VERONA, N. C.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I am a little, dark complexioned woman, twenty years old, with brown hair and eyes and weigh one hundred and ten pounds. I have been married three years and have a good husband, and a sweet little girl of eighteen months.

On the divorce question, I do not believe in it. I think if mothers would talk to their girls about getting married and explain household duties and care to them, and also tell them more of the ways of men, there would not be so many girls in such haste to get married. I was married when only seventeen and I do not regret it, but I married a boy that was "settle headed" as the saying is, and five years older than myself. I was an orphan with no father or mother to love and care for me. But I think any girl with a mother should stay with her until she is twenty at least.

Some one said that it was not the hand that rocked the cradle that ruled the world, but I think it has quite a lot to do with it. I think the fathers do not take enough interest in training their sons.

Mrs. J. C. Mason, you are one of my state sisters, but I cannot agree with you on the corset question.

Uncle Charlie's Home Fund

UNCLE CHARLIE reports having received during January $140.00, donations and proceeds of subscriptions, contributed to his Home Fund by 196 persons. This, added to what he had previously received brings the total up to $880.00 contributed by 1,114 individuals. The January contribution is disappointing, as it is less than half the sum contributed in December; but I presume most of the good people drained the purses for Christmas and were not very flush for a while after. I am confidently expecting that February report will show a large increase and I hope it will go over $351.00, the December record.

The largest single donation thus far received is $11.00 and came from Edna E. Huntsman of Dart, Ohio, who raised that sum by giving a church entertainment for the purpose. Here is a good idea which others interested in helping to boost Uncle Charlie's Home Fund might adopt by giving a social entertainment at the church, the schoolhouse or at their homes to raise money for this purpose.

Uncle Charlie writes each contributor a personal acknowledgment and he is duly grateful to all who have helped in any way. Because a severe attack of the grippe this winter nearly knocked him out he was unable for a while to send prompt acknowledgments.

As yet the fund is far from sufficient to provide him a home, and I trust his friends will make a grand rally for him this month.

Again let me remind you how you can help:

1. By cash donations.

2. By purchasing Uncle Charlie's books (see advertisement.)

3. Those who cannot spare the money for a cash donation or for purchase of his books can contribute by getting subscriptions to COMFORT in aid of the "Uncle Charlie Benefit Fund" and instead of taking the club premium or cash commission themselves direct that it be credited to the fund. In such cases I will pay over to Uncle Charlie one half of the subscription price of all subscriptions sent for this purpose. The regular cash commission on COMFORT subscriptions is 40 per cent, but for Uncle Charlie's Benefit Fund I will allow 50 per cent. Another way to help him and benefit yourself is to get up a subscription club and take one of his books as your premium.

In one or other of these ways every COMFORT reader who wishes to do so can help swell the fund for Uncle Charlie which has my hearty approval and will have my assistance.

confidence and the faith you have in my ability to do what you apparently are too busy or too lazy to do for yourself. The world is surely getting topsy turvy when children instruct their elders to do their work for them. The United States has been called the paradise of women. It would be far better to call it the paradise of children, excepting of course those poor little victims who have been pushed into the mines and factories. In Europe the parents rule the children, in the U. S. children rule the parents, and youthful egotism and conceit results to an appalling degree. But I'm not going to lecture Uyless, all I want to do is to write your poem and earn that two cents, for I need the money. "I'll Never Love No one Like I Do Him." What a wonderful title, and it suggests some deliciously romatic idea, but, alas! even for two cents I could not be hired to construct a poem around a title which is disgracefully ungrammatical. A good deal can be excused under the plea of poetic license, but not a title like his. If you had written it "I Will Never Love Anyone As I Love Him," I could have done something high class and worth while, but with a sentence that contains a double negative I am stumped. However I want the two cents, so here goes.

I'll never love no one like I do him,
For when my pocketbook was mighty slim,
He sent me two cents for a poem,
Good Lord how much I owe him,
I'll never love no one like I do him.

Uyless, that's all I can do for two cents. I know two cents is a good deal of money in these hard times, but as you aspire to be a poet the only way to aid you in your aspirations is to insist that you write your own poems instead of hiring them done at two cents a clip.

322 West 42nd St., NEW YORK, N. Y.

MY DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

It surely was a great treat for me to hear your voice over the phone this afternoon. You can hardly imagine how happy it has made me to know that I have really and truly talked with Uncle Charlie.

You are doing a wonderful amount of good and how I do wish that we had some more Uncle Charlies' like you.

Would like to tell you how much I like you Uncle, but words are useless. Of course I would like to come over and see you sometime yet I hardly feel worthy of such an honor, although you have invited me to go.

As I was saying over the phone today, I run an elevator in one of the big office buildings down town and it is customary for the tenants to give the elevator runners and starter a little remembrance for Christmas. We are going to send a list around to each tenant containing the names of the elevator runners and starter and we wanted to have a poem of some kind on it so that we might extract a little money from some of the tenants who might have a tendency to be a little stingy. Most anything will do, especially if it has a little touch of the Christmas spirit about it. Even one like Walt Mason's daily poems in the Globe would be all right. Will leave it to you Uncle Charlie as I know after reading your book of Poems that you can get something just right and whatever it is, it will be satisfactory.

Long live Uncle Charlie, Faithfully Yours,
ROSCOE HALEY.

I thought this letter of Roscoe Haley's, which gives our country readers a little glimpse of city life would prove interesting at least to those many thousands of very foolish people (doubting Thomas's) who think that Uncle Charlie does not exist. This letter it seems to me will give them proof that I do exist. Some idiots say that if Uncle Charlie really existed he would have his address in COMFORT. Many people complain bitterly, because the address is not published. If they'd stop to think for a moment they would know why it is not given. As soon as people get my address, which is printed on every one of my books and has been so printed for nearly twelve years, numbers of them, with the very best intentions in the world, but with intentions which result in endless trouble, work and expense, insist on sending me their subscriptions, making me the medium of all their business transactions with COMFORT. Just to avoid endless muddles and mixups of this character and for no other reason, my home address is withheld. All letters however sent me care of COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, are forwarded to me in my big box of mail once a week. Now if any of you are within a few hundred miles of New York City, and are dubious of my existence, you can call me up on the phone, and if I'm not down and out with one or other of my ailments, in a few seconds you'll hear a voice rolling over the wire that will gladden the cockles of your heart and make your feet rattle in your shoes. Now perhaps some of you would like to know what I wrote for the elevator man. Many of you can use at least a portion of this "pome" to help jar loose some of the all necessary dollars from the pockets of your employers and others you think should remember you next season.

The Elevator Man's Christmas

BY UNCLE CHARLIE.

The festal season now is here,
The season glad of joy and cheer.
The time when all men show some sign
That proves there origin divine.
The Christ Child brought from realms above,
His message sweet of peace and love,
And now that Christmastime draws near,
Again Heaven's messengers we hear.
In God's great universal plan
Of love, the elevator man.

* * * * * * * * * * * *

We need no introduction, you
Have proved us oft, and found us true.
Your lives each day all through the year,
You trust with us and have no fear.
Your murmured orders we obey
With promptness, and we try each day
To let you off at the right floor
Without a jerk. Could we do more?
As tense as steel we strain each nerve
So you the better we may serve.
We take you up, we take you down,
And if you search this mighty town,
You'll find no truer servant than
The faithful elevator man,
Who, though he works like a machine,
Is like yourself a human being.
We have more ups and downs you know
Than any mortal here below;
And though to giddy heights we flit,
We're at the bottom when we quit.
Our lot is hard, and that is why
With cost of living soaring high,
And wages slim, we hope we'll not,
When Christmas comes, be quite forgot.
We've given you many a lift, and we Would just the happiest mortals be,
If you'd return the compliment
And send to us that fat old gent,
Good Santa Claus, beloved and dear,
With just a mite of Yuletide cheer.
Cheer that will fill the frying pan,
Likewise the elevator man.
And now on Providence we call,
To bless you each, and bless you all.
And bless the ones that you hold dear,
With Christmas bright and glad New Year.

Questions and Answers

DEHORNING CALVES.—Will you tell me through your paper the best way to dehorn young stock?

G. H. B., Iowa.

A.—Calves are best dehorned by the use of caustic potash which may be bought at the drug-store. It comes in sticks like school crayon. The stick should be wrapped in heavy paper in order to prevent injury to the hands. When horns first appear, clip the hair away, moisten the end of the potash stick in water and rub button thoroughly with it. Horns so treated will never grow.

TO PREVENT SMUT ON OATS.—I have seen your recipe for treating oats for smut with formaldehyde, in COMFORT, but I have lost the paper and forgotten the amount of formaldehyde to use. R. H. J., Pa.

A.—Use one pint of formaldehyde to forty gallons of water. Immerse grain in this. Sprinkling does little good.

SELECTING A RAM.—I am going into the sheep business. Have bought twenty-five common ewes and expect to raise my lambs for early fall market. Will you please tell me what kind of ram to buy to make the most money out of my lambs. R. H. J., Mo.

A.—Two years ago your own experiment station carried out a trial in feeding lambs that illustrates your problem splendidly. They fed two lots of lambs for the same period. One lot was sired by a scrub ram, the other by a pure bred Southdown. The first lot weighed less and sold for $4.50 per cwt.; the second lot was heavier and sold for $7.35 per cwt. By all means use a pure bred ram of one of the good mutton breeds. Send to your experiment station at Columbia, Mo., for Circular No. 65 which will be very helpful to you.

RAISING HOGS WITHOUT CORN.—I own 320 acres of land here in Arizona, a part of which is irrigated. On the irrigated portion we can grow good crops of Alfalfa and small grain but corn does not make a very good crop. Do you think I can raise hogs successfully without corn? R. L. K., Arizona.

A.—Yes. Pork in the past has been made most cheaply in the Corn Belt. California conditions are very similar to your own. Their experiment station has recently been experimenting on hog raising. The best advice I can give you is to send for their bulletin No. 237, Pork Production Under California Conditions. This should be very helpful to you. They will probably send it free for the asking. Write the Experiment Station, Berkeley, California.

Comfort's Bedtime Stories For Little Folks!

A Library of Cute Little Books

40 WONDERFUL TALES IN STORY AND VERSE 40

Beautifully Illustrated

Library of 12 Sent For One Subscription!

The stories of our childhood—how well we remember them. After all it seems but a short time since we listened with rapt attention to the adventures of Robinson Crusoe cast away on his lonely island—of beautiful Cinderella, the fairy and the prince—the tragic fate of poor little Red Riding Hood—these were only a few of the marvelous tales that thrilled our childish imagination and helped us spend many blissful hours.

The children of today are the same as they were fifty years ago. And these good old-time stories are just as popular with the young folks now as they were then. So we have decided to give our little boy and girl friends a fine big collection of these stories including some of the old-time favorites as well as a number of newer and later books equally as interesting. We have arranged three different sets or "libraries"—each library consisting of twelve books, no two alike, and you can have your choice of any one library, or two libraries, or all three libraries. Library No. 7951 comprises the following twelve titles:

Robinson Crusoe, Little Red Riding Hood, Cinderella, Mother Goose, Animal Pets, Purring Pussies, Playmates, Our Pets, The Three Bears, The Sleeping Beauty, Playful Pets, The Teddy Bears.

Library No. 7991 has these twelve titles:

The Shepherd And His Sheep, Young America, The Deep Blue Sea, Land of Tulips, Rex and Rover, Our Farm Yard, Little Darlings, Childhood of Hiawatha, Faithful Friends, The Fancy Dress Party, Our Country, Happy Days.

Library No. 8001 consists of these twelve titles:

Little Sweethearts, The Story of Little Piggie Wig, In The Jungle, The Big League, Doggie Doings, Fred's Feathered Friends, Uncle Jerry's Farm, Chums, The Story of Santa Claus, Little Laddies, Pussy's Pranks, Faithful And True.

As these stories are intended for the younger children some of them have been "boiled down" to the fewest and simplest words so that they are not as complete as the original editions, but all of them are printed on fine paper in large clear type that is easy to see and read and have no less than five beautiful full page illustrations in colors.

Some of the titles named above of course need no introduction. The other titles are just the sort of stories that delight every child—stories of childish sports, flowers, the sea, Indians, animal pets, horses, donkeys, dogs, bunnies, pussy cats, chickens, lambs, etc., wonderful romances in which there are old Stone Castles, Kings, Queens, Princes, Princesses, Good Fairies, and Wicked Fairies, stories of the Bear Family—Pa Bear, old Ma Bear and little "Teddy" Bear, stories of little Playmates, the true tale of the Teddy Bears—in fact the finest collection of juvenile short stories ever published. Each book is nicely bound with a handsomely illustrated cover in colors and is 4 inches by 5¼ inches in size.

There is nothing you could get for the children that would make them any happier than one or more of these cute libraries and best of all it will cost you nothing as we are giving them away as a premium. We will send you free your choice of any one, two, or all three libraries—each library consisting of twelve stories, each story in a book by itself, twelve different books in all—on the terms of the following special offers:

Offer A. For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25 cents we will send you any one library of twelve books by parcel post prepaid. Be sure to mention number of library wanted.

Offer B. For your own subscription or renewal or extension of your present subscription for one year at 25 cents and 10 cents additional (35 cents in all) we will send you any one library by parcel post prepaid. Be sure to mention number of library wanted.

Offer C. For two one-year subscriptions at 25 cents each, or one 3-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents we will send you any two libraries, or for three one-year subscriptions at 25 cents each, we will send you all three libraries, parcel post prepaid. Don't forget to give number or numbers of libraries wanted.

Extra Gift For Promptness! If you will send three subscriptions and 75 cents for all three libraries within 15 days we will send you four extra books absolutely free. This will give you one grand complete library of forty of these splendid little books, all different titles, of uniform size and binding, handsomely printed and illustrated in colors. Use of Paint on the Farm

By Charles Francis Reed

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

"I HARDLY thought I could afford to hire the place painted, yet the buildings and the machinery all looked rusty, as if a good dose of paint would make them over." Mr. Johnson stood at the big gate and looked at the now trim white and green house, with the equally prosperous outbuildings.

"So I painted them myself, with the hired man as helper—painted everything from the house to the corn cutter. I find paint both useful and ornamental, for besides looking more slick, the whole place has a new lease of life."

Any man can do a fair job when it comes to painting. He may not be able to work as quickly or as skillfully as a trained workman, but his work will have the desired effect even if it is not quite even in thickness, or if there are parts of it that appear striped. And paint should never be considered a luxury, but a necessity, for it is a most valuable protection. Paint also has a hygienic effect for it is most sanitary.

Selecting the brush is most important, probably the most useful one being a round one having bristles about six inches in length. These bristles are a little too long for proper working, and before starting, it is better to tie a narrow piece of cloth about four inches from the end of the bristles, and about two inches from the binding point. As the brush wears this bridle, as it is called, may be pushed back, in that way lengthening the life of your brush.

Oval brushes, from two or three inches wide are very good for general use, and a great deal of painting is done with a large flat brush, four or five inches long. The advantage of this brush is that a great deal of surface can be covered at one stroke, the only disadvantage being that the paint cannot be thoroughly rubbed into the wood, as can be done with an oval brush. For smaller surfaces, window sashes about the interior of the house, pieces of furniture and small pieces of machinery, small brushes are needed. The question of the brush used must largely depend on the individual taste of the person who is doing the work.

In addition to the paint brushes, a dusting brush, one with very stiff bristles, is a help in cleaning the surface that is to be painted. For the cleaning of metal surfaces that have been allowed to rust a small wire brush is necessary if the job is to be well done.

The care of paint brushes is most important. Those that have been used for the applying of an oil paint should be very carefully cleaned after using, though if they are only to be left overnight, wrapping them in thick paper will be sufficient. Some painters keep their brushes over night by putting them in water. If a brush is to be left for some time, however, it should be well cleaned of all the paint. The best way to clean a brush is to wash it thoroughly in turpentine, but as turpentine is expensive, kerosene may be substituted. After the paint has all been washed off, the brush should be well washed with soap and hot water. After being dried it is best to put paint brushes away where they will be free from dampness or dust.

All surfaces should be prepared for painting. They should always be clean and dry. New wood is very difficult to paint, for the resin in such wood as yellow pine, or spruce has a tendency to destroy any paint applied to them. The ideal way is to allow a newly built house to stand six months before painting, for the exposure to the weather either hardens or washes away the resin. As this means that the new house must be unsightly for some months, the new wood is generally treated, and then painted. The most general method of preparing new wood for painting is to coat all the knot-holes, or other spots where there seems to be a large amount of resin with shellac varnish, a solution of gum shellac in alcohol. After applying this coat, all nail holes should be filled with putty before the final coats of paint are applied. In painting iron made machinery all rust and grease should be removed, and the surface sandpapered.

Paint only in a warm, dry spell. A little moisture under the paint will mean trouble.

For a really good piece of work it is necessary to give the object to be painted at least two coats of paint, and three will be better. A great many painters add a quantity of drier and turpentine to their first coat of paint and hurry it on in any fashion, applying a second coat almost before the other is dry. This is poor policy. Just as much care is needed with the first coat as the second.

The painting of tin roofs, or of waterpipes is difficult as paint does not adhere well to metals. This is due to a thin layer or grease that coats metals, and before starting on such a piece of work it is well to scrub the metal clean with soap and water, or wash it with cloths that have been moistened with benzine. Galvanized iron is treated in the same way, and does no harm if it is allowed to be exposed to the weather for a time before being painted.

The care of the machinery on which depends to such a large extent the success of the farming year, is most important. The metal portions of machinery are generally cast iron or steel. Cast iron is less apt to rust than steel, but no matter what the composition, nothing about the farm needs the protection of paint more than the metal parts of machinery. Before painting greatest care should be taken that the surface is absolutely clean. To hurry over the cleaning part of the labor, or to attempt to save time by just touching the bad spots with sandpaper, is a mistake. All oil and grease should be carefully removed, and the paint should be well rubbed in, filling in all the cracks.

The paint that is best for protecting iron is red lead. It is expensive, and rather hard to apply, and some people object to the color. The color can be darkened by the addition of lampblack, and the farmer who can and will afford the time and money necessary to use red lead is repaid by the service it gives. Any good oil paint will give valuable protection to the metal of your machinery if it is applied carefully and properly.

The choice of the paint that is to be used is a question that must be answered by each individual. There are a number of ready mixed paints to be procured that might be very highly recommended. On the other hand a great many men prefer to mix their own paint. This is not an easy job, and the amount of material and labor needed makes it about as expensive as buying ready mixed paint. If ready mixed paints are used the cans serve as buckets, but if the paint is home mixed a strong tin pail is needed for the stirring of the paint. A paint strainer is a help, as paint should be strained before using, but two folds of strong cheese-cloth will do if you have not a strainer.

A paint scraper and a putty knife are necessary helps, and these can be made; the scraper from a piece of sheet iron, that is not thick, and the putty knife from an old kitchen knife whose end has been ground down till it is square.

Remember that turpentine and benzine are highly inflammable, and paint containing these ingredients should not be put near an open flame.

Many pigments used in paint are poisonous, and workmen should be careful to remove all paint stains from their hands. A man should not eat in the same clothes in which he has been painting but should change and remove all stains from his skin. Do not use benzine or turpentine on the skin, but oil the parts stained with linseed oil, or any other fatty oil, and then wash thoroughly with hot water and soap.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

I, for one, do not think it any harm to wear one. I wear my corsets as regularly as I do my shoes; but I do not wear them tight enough to cause injury.

Just one more subject that I sure do believe in and that is life insurance. Some man might say that if he left an insurance his wife would marry again and her next husband would spend the money he had worked for, when possibly it would enable the poor wife to start some profitable business to care for herself and the family. Then she would not have to get married. I would like to hear the other sisters' ideas on it.

We live on a small but well cultivated farm, six miles from a railroad, but not far from the river and the Atlantic Ocean. Our crops are mostly cotton, corn, potatoes and peanuts, though a few raise sugar cane.

Thanking the sisters and Mrs. W. for the many, many helps I receive from COMFORT and with love to all the COMFORT family and hoping to hear from the sisters, North Carolina and Florida sisters, particularly, I remain, MRS. NELLIE CAPPS.

WILMINGTON, N. C.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

As I've never seen a letter from this part of North Carolina I thought I would ask to join your happy and cozy corner. We live four miles from the city in a small but comfortable four-room house of our own. My oldest boy is four years old, the next is two and the baby is sixteen months old. None of them are sickly, in fact, everyone out this way seems to be healthy.

My two oldest boys can repeat by heart a part of the twenty-third Psalm. I have never had any trouble in teaching my oldest boy. He can pronounce any word of three letters, also add and subtract. He likes to draw ships and wagons on his blackboard. I am a firm believer in pushing a child in education and I feel that when they want to mark all over the wall, doors and everywhere, you should guide their little hands in letters and figures so that when they start to school it will be so much easier for them.

What I wanted to speak of more than anything else, was Georgie's letter, for I was shocked at her statements about country children. I was not born in the country but I am staying in the country now for the health of my children, more than anything else. And as for country children speaking indecently, I have never heard the children around here speak in that manner. I should think a child could hear more improper language in a crowded city in one day than he could hear in the quiet country in a week. And I can't imagine a city child being more innocent than a country child.

Of course we don't have all the modern improvements that the city dwellers have, but we keep everything sanitary. The country sends a health officer around to see that everything is kept clean. Also our back yard is as clean as our front. We wouldn't think of leaving trash in our yards or where it would breed germs.

I agree with Sister Georgie that it is inconvenient to send children to country schools, if they have a long distance to travel, but the walk is very good for the larger children. But as for a child being healthier in the city, I can't agree with her; neither will a good physician.

Country schools are all right; if the pupil has the vim to learn he will learn anywhere. A visit through the city school will show many boys and girls in grades lower than they should be, and the teacher or the school system is not to blame.

With best wishes to Mrs. Wilkinson and all the sisters, MRS. L. M. CRAIG.

PALESTINE, OHIO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

After reading the sisters' letters in COMFORT this month (and a good bunch of letters they are too) I could not keep silent any longer. I have been a subscriber for several years, and enjoy every department of the magazine, especially the sisters' letters and Uncle Charlie's talks, which are soul inspiring and uplifting. I always find something helpful in the letters each month. Those pertaining to the care of children interest me most. I have a little orphan nephew; he was left entirely in my care when five weeks old (his mother) my youngest sister passed to that home beyond when he was seven weeks old. I had had no experience whatever with a bottle fed baby. I did not let anything get by me that would give me information on the care and feeding of baby. I have the book on "Infant Care" sent out by the Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor. It was a great help to me in many ways. By all means feed baby at regular hours and baby troubles will be lightened to a great extent. I also had the advice of a good doctor, which is very important when a baby is bottle fed. My little boy is now two years and eight months old and is a bright, healthy little fellow, with blue eyes and beautiful brown hair. I think love and kindness count the most in the upbringing of children. We should strive to acquire patience as that is a most needful article also.

Elizabeth Dirks. I agree with you on your views. Aside from other educational advantages I think every boy and girl should have a thorough training in the "homely arts," good homemaking and good housekeeping, also a course in "nursing" for the girl. What is more unfortunate in a household, when sickness enters and no one capable of performing the duties of a nurse. It is not every family who can afford to hire a nurse. Give the boy the manual training, he can make good use of it. Last but not the least give both the boy and the girl a good business training. They need it, especially the girl, if thrown on her own resources. If an estate is left to settle up or money entanglements to straighten out, what a help it is to a woman to understand business and legal proceedings.

The country vs. city life is interersting. I am in favor of country life. Life on the farm has its ups and downs yet with good management it can be made most comfortable and enjoyable.

Sister Edythe, you certainly took upon your young shoulders a great task when you began mothering those children. I am glad to know there is one happy stepmother; perhaps you knew and loved the children before you undertook to mother them. When a woman contemplates being a stepmother she should meet the children before undertaking the task and find out whether or not she can love them; if she cannot do so, she should not marry the father and all be miserable. If all things were looked at from a practical viewpoint and everything well considered beforehand the stepmother problem would not turn out so badly as it so often does. And stepmothers whatever you may know concerning a child's mother never mention it to the child, unless it is something that the child would love to hear.

Hurrah for Frank and Martha! long may you both live to enjoy the fruits of your labors.

With love and good wishes to Mrs. Wilkinson and the sisters, I am, ANOTHER BACHELOR GIRL.

RUSSELL, MINN.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

May I gain admittance to your cozy circle? My mother has taken COMFORT for some years and now that I have a home of my own I take it. I think it is a fine paper and greatly enjoy reading the sisters' letters and Uncle Charlie's interesting talks.

Mrs. W. M. Reynolds, I am sorry but must say I do not believe as you do that after one is divorced they ought not to remarry while the other is alive. Just because one has been unhappy and secured a divorce consequently, is no reason why they should not marry again and be happy. I have a friend who has been divorced and today is married again and is very happy and contented.

I am interested in Woman Suffrage and hope to vote some day.

Georgie, it makes me fairly indignant to have you write that the country children are not as innocent as the city children and also you say a country home is so inferior to a city home. Unless one has a large home in the city and a large back yard for the children where they can play they are very apt to have a hard time to keep their children at home and off the street, where they are liable to fall into bad company. Generally, I think the city children are more rude and use more slang than the country children. I know many of the sisters will agree with me in this. I know many a poor family who are living in the city in two or three small rooms would give anything to get out in the country where they could breathe the pure air and enjoy the many blessings of country life. Of course we folks in the country cannot attend the theater every night or the pink teas every afternoon and we are just as happy and perhaps more so than those who do.

Mrs. Scott Sherer, you express my sentiments exactly in regard to letting children believe in Santa Claus.

The Doings of The Dapperlings

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1911, by Lena B. Ellingwood.
(All rights reserved.)

EXPLANATORY.—This story tells the strange things that happen to five-year-old Simmie-Sammie Smith and his sister Pittysing, nearly two years older, through the sly pranks of Nattie, the "Smallest Dapperling of All." The Dapperlings are kind-hearted, gay little elflike beings who ride on rabbits and never let themselves be seen by human eyes because of their belief that, if seen, it would bring some terrible calamity upon them. For this reason their queer little houses are always built into the hillside, and are so made, with doors and windows in front and grass growing on the backs, that they can be turned around to face out when the Dapperlings are by themselves; but as soon as anybody comes in sight the houses are whirled around so that only the grass-covered backs are seen and, as these look like the rest of the hill, you would never know the houses were there. They also have an underground assembly hall with an opening in the top covered with moss and concealed in a clump of thistles.

THERE WERE ALL THE LOST CLOTHES, NICE AND CLEAN, HUNG UP TO DRY.

CHAPTER VI.

WASHING DAY

SIMMIE-SAMMIE was feeding corn to his Plymouth Rock hen one morning, and wondering how she could swallow the big, hard kernels so easily, when his sister called to him from the doorway. Pittysing was well again, and the pretty color had come back to her cheeks.

"Simmie-Sammie! I'm going to wash Sarah-Grace-Josephine's clothes in the Mill Brook. If you'll be a good boy, you may go with me and carry part of the things."

Pittysing was wise, you see, for a little girl. She wanted Simmie-Sammie's help, but she knew if she said, "Simmie-Sammie, you must help me carry these things down to the Mill Brook," he would answer, "No, I don't want to." But when he might do it if he would be good, then it was a different matter, and he came gladly. It's all in the way you look at a thing, you see.

Sarah-Grace-Josephine was in bed. She couldn't go with them, for every single dress she owned needed washing, except her yellow silk muslin, and Pittysing was too careful a mother to let her child play around the brook in her very best dress.

Simmie-Sammie carried the little washboard, a piece of soap, and the bluing bottle. I don't suppose Pittysing could have blued the whole brook to rinse her clothes in, but it seemed a necessary part of the washing outfit, so she took it along. Pittysing carried a boxful of the clothes she was going to wash.

For as much as five minutes Simmie-Sammie watched while his sister, kneeling on the bank, soaped the little garments, one by one, and rubbed them briskly on the washboard. But when he found that he couldn't be trusted to wash, too, he didn't see the fun. So he wandered off to find amusement for himself, leaving Pittysing singing happily,

"'This is the way we wash our clothes,
Wash our clothes, wash our clothes,
This is the way we wash our clothes
So early Monday morning.'"

After a while Pittysing missed him, and called, "Simmie-Sammie!"

No answer.

"Simmie-Sammie Smith!" she called, louder this time.

Still he didn't answer.

"Come right straight back here," she called, "or I'll go and tell mamma you're lost."

"Well, I'm a-coming', ain't I?" he said. He wasn't far off, and he had heard her all the time, but he didn't like to answer, and I'll tell you why.

When he came to the brook, and his sister saw the look on his face, she asked sternly, "What have you been doing?"

"Oh, I—found sump'n," Simmie-Sammie answered.

"Show it to me!" Pittysing demanded.

"No," he refused, holding his hand behind him. "Guess I don't have to do ev'ything you say."

"It's a good thing you've got me to see to you," Pittysing declared solemnly, "for mamma couldn't watch you all the time. But seems to me," she added, "you're getting MOST old enough to watch yourself. Now show me what's in your hand, or I shan't let you help feed Chippie Chatter for two whole days."

"Well, then, look! It's sump'n awful nice, an' I guess you'll wish you'd found it first." He only said this to make believe it was all right.

Then he held out his hand, and in it were two pretty little greenish-blue eggs.

Pittysing looked at him sorrowfully.

"Yes," she said. "I DO wish I'd found 'em first, so I could have kept you from touching 'em. I didn't s'pose my own little brother'd be mean enough to rob a bird's nest. Don't you remember that robin out in the apple tree back of our house, what a pretty song he sings? Well, those little eggs, are robins' eggs, and if you'd left 'em in the nest, by and by little baby robins would have hatched out, and when they grew up, they'd have sung sweet songs, too. Don't you want to have pretty songs in the world, to make folks happy?"

Simmie-Sammie didn't look happy. Even the sweetest kind of a song wouldn't have made him happy then, for he knew he wasn't doing right.

"And don't you know," went on Pittysing, "that those big robins 'll feel just awful bad when they come back to the nest and find the eggs gone? You just show me where you found the nest, and we'll go put the eggs back. Prob'ly they won't hatch out now, but MAYBE they will. Come."

Simmie-Sammie's face had been working queerly while Pittysing preached her little sermon. He had been trying to keep the tears back, but now they came with a rush.

"They must hatch out! They shall! I'll make 'em!" he cried, and he stamped his foot.

Together they went to where, on a low branch of a fir tree that grew close by the fence, he had found the robins' nest.

"Now I'll climb up on the fence, and you pass 'em up to me, one at a time," Pittysing directed. "Mind you don't break one."

"No," said Simmie-Sammie, "'twas me what tooked 'em out, an' it must be me what putted 'em back. YOU hold the eggs, an' I'LL climb up."

"There!" Pittysing said, when the eggs were safe in the nest once more, "that's done! You won't ever be such a bad boy again. Now we'll go back to the brook, and while I'm washing, you can make boats of plantain leaves, and send 'em sailing down the brook."

But when they got back to the brook, an awful thing had happened. That is, it was awful for Sarah-Grace-Josephine. Yes, and for Pittysing, too. All the time they had been gone, the tiny Mill Brook had been running along just the same as usual—just as it had for years and years and years—dancing over the pebbles, and singing its little murmuring song all to itself.

And it wasn't the brook's fault that Pittysing had left Sarah-Grace-Josephine's clothes in the water when she went to see about the eggs. Part of the little clothes were in sight, clinging to rocks and plants along the water's edge, but many of them had floated off down the stream, out of sight. And the children couldn't go after them, for that was farther than they were allowed to go.

"Oh, dear me SUZ!" wailed Pittysing. "They may be in the Slantic Ocean by this time! Her little pink gingham dress, and her white apron, and her lace handkerchief—oh, everything, pretty near! Simmie-Sammie, I—I b'lieve I'm going to cry! I pretty near feel it coming!"

"You needn't!" cried Simmie-Sammie, for he knew if Sarah-Grace-Josephine never had any clothes to wear it would be all his fault. "Don't you do it an' I'll—I'll be a good boy, an' not make you watch me to keep me from being bad. Honest, I will!"

Pittysing threw her arms about him joyfully.

"Well there!" she cried. "If anything will make you good always, I'm glad it's happened. Help me pick up what things didn't sail off. If Sarah-Grace-Josephine's got to stay in bed, we'll play she's sick, and you can be the doctor. I wonder if she better have the scarlet measles or the dicktheria."

Sarah-Grace-Josephine was a smiling patience, and never once looked cross, though she was dosed with vinegar and brown bread pills for medicine, and had a wet bandage 'round her head, and hot vaseline on her chest.

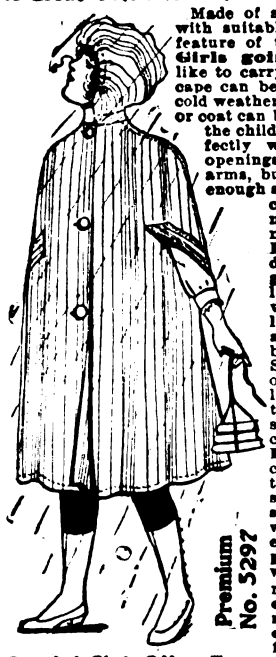
She was enough better next day so the children took her for an airing down to the brook, wrapped in Simmie-Sammie's red sweater. As they neared the brook, Pittysing stopped suddenly, so surprised she nearly dropped her child.

"Well, for the love of—" she commenced, then thrusting Sarah-Grace-Josephine into Simmie-Sammie's arms, she rushed for the little hazelnut bush, for there were all the lost clothes, nice and clean, hung up to dry.

"Now Sawah-Gwace-Josephine's got her clothes, an' I won't have to be good," said Simmie-Sammie.

"Yes, you will! Don't think you can get out of it!" his sister told him. "A promise is a promise, and you can't take it back."

"Well, anyway, I didn't say always," muttered Simmie-Sammie.



The Smallest Dapperling of All had had an awful struggle getting all those clothes out of the brook, and back where they belonged. She had torn her own dress, and pretty near got drowned, but when she saw how delighted Pittysing was, she didn't feel a bit sorry she had done it, but went singing all the way home,

"The bestest time I ever-ever had,
Was when I made somebody-body glad.
Sing-ho! Heigh-oh!
Heigh-oh! Sing-ho!
The way to have a merry-merry heart,
Is, just be sure to always do your part!
Sing-ho! Heigh-oh!
Heigh-oh! Sing-ho!"

Don't miss April COMFORT which will tell how the Dapperling village escapes a frightful danger.

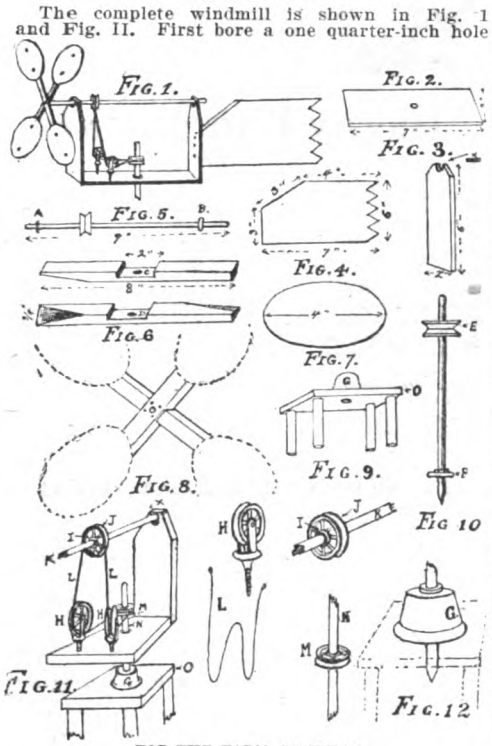
A Corner for Boys

By Uncle John



"WHEW," the wind is blowing so hard that I scarcely have breath enough to say, "How do you do?" It is a pretty chilly wind too, and, I fancy, you boys of the mild climate regions have more to be thankful for than you are aware of. After all, the weather doesn't make much difference if we are sound and healthy and our chief concern should be to remain in that condition. Nowadays, the doctrine of "How to be well," is literally preached from the housetops. Every newspaper and magazine contains practical health hints and reliable books on the subject are available to even the poorest of us. Boys, as a rule, do not think much about their bodies, but it is well to realize that youth and strength are fleeting blessings and must be conserved. Do not think you can indulge in bad habits without paying the penalty, This idea has wrecked millions of careers. Many a prematurely old man owes his decadence to the things he learned to do in boyhood. It may be that the tobacco a boy indulges in will make a weak old man of him before he is forty, or that night reading injudiciously practised will ruin his eyesight. It is the duty of every human being to investigate himself from time to time and make some changes in his manner of living. Life is an individual knot which each one must untie for himself.

Telephones to Horse

Fire department horses, which are now rapidly being replaced by gasoline and electric power, are usually intelligent and quick to respond to orders, but sometimes they grow so accustomed to obeying a single individual that they absolutely ignore commands given by any one else. An episode, that illustrates this peculiarity, occurred some years ago in a Connecticut town. During the absence of a veteran driver, the bell clanged, and all the horses responded except the absent man's particular charge. He refused to budge because he had not heard the familiar voice of his master and finally they called the man up on the telephone and asked him to suggest some way out of the dilemma. With the resourcefulness of the true fire fighter, he sensed what was wrong with the stubborn animal and said: "Put the phone to his ear and let me talk to him." Fortunately, the proximity of the telephone made this possible, and, as soon as his suggestion was followed, the fireman shouted his familiar words of command to the puzzled equine. It was not necessary to repeat them, for the animal instantly recognized the voice and flew to his proper position under the suspended harness.

Windmill

The complete windmill is shown in Fig. I and Fig. II. First bore a one quarter-inch hole in the center of a two by seven-inch board and to each end of it, nail a piece like Fig. 3. The hard wood shaft, Fig. 5, is one quarter inch in diameter and nine inches long. The wheel is formed of the two arms, Fig. 6, and the four oval disks of tin or wood, Fig. 4. Fig. 8 is a bigger view of it. The tail-board is shown above Fig. 4. The bench upon which the nail rests is made of broomstick legs and a seven by four-inch board top. Glue the spool "G" to the center of it and bore a hole under the spool hole. The upright shaft, Fig 10, fits into it. It runs on the bearing, "F" and "E" is a pulley. Two special pulleys like "H" are screwed to the table, as shown in Fig. II. They are one inch in diameter and one inch apart. The line used is a loop of flexible wire or heavy cord as thick as a match. It passes over all pulleys used. The pair, "H", "H" are loose the pulleys "J" and "M" are tight on the shafts and move with them. The windmill has a double motion. The wind turns the wheel and through the belt or cord transmission the shaft, Fig. 10, merrily revolves. Paint the finished product and oil or grease the bearings.

FOR THE FARM AT HOME.

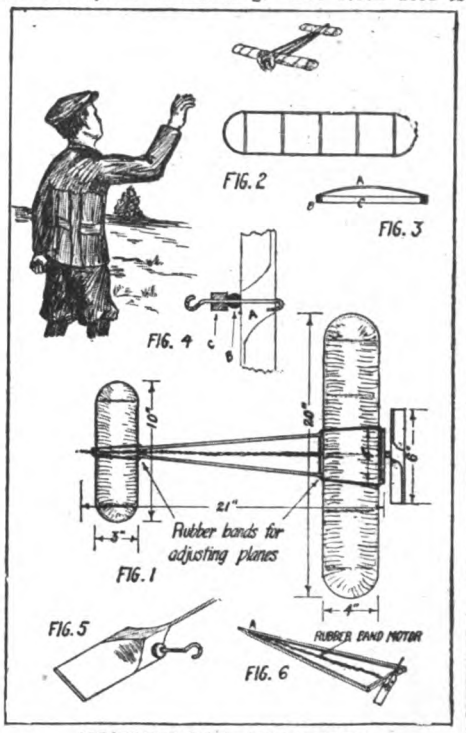
Cultivating Sponges



Sponges, in their natural state, are a growth of a low order of animal life which attaches itself to rocks in deep water. Of late years, the demand has grown greater than the production, and some means of augmenting the natural beds has been steadfastly sought by experts. One of the successful methods consists of cutting a seed sponge into several parts, just as potatoes are cut at planting time, and fixing them to cement disks which are then lowered slowly into watery caverns, suited to the purpose. After two years' time, the blocks are raised by divers and considerable new growth is generally found upon them. In the natural fisheries considerable loss is entailed because the sponges cling so tenaciously that they cannot be entirely torn from the rocks but the cultivated article readily peels off and involves no waste whatever. Another late development of the industry is the making of artificial sponges out of rubber and paper.

Thinking Power

If you are ever to reach a high station in life, it will have to be mainly through your thinking power. This means that you will have to use your brains as well as your hands. Hard work is only half the ammunition we have at our disposal. Hard thinking is the other half. The hunter who takes careful aim will not have to fire many shots to fill his bag. The one who shoots recklessly at every stirring leaf may come home empty-handed. Did you ever see a cow standing in a field while its calf bleated pitifully from the other side of the fence? With every bit of strength and feeling in its body, the mother longs to get close to her young but the bovine intellect is not capable of understanding that a strong push against the fence would shatter it. So all day long she moans and bleats and sorrows. Many of us are in the same situation. We whine and fret and worry while all we need to do is to stop and think, and then apply our force and labor intelligently. Be definite in your planning. Have your work mentally done before you touch a hand to it. Don't take things as they come but make them come to suit you.

Aeroplane Model

The model shown herewith is of the simplest type. Fig. 6 shows the chassis or body. It is a triangular frame four inches wide at the base and twenty-one inches long. The stock used is not more than one quarter-inch square and must be light and strong. Cypress, pine, bamboo or spruce splints are good for the purpose. Glue the pieces together and reinforce the joints with small brads or a thread wrapping. The motor consists of rubber bands, stretched quite tightly. At the end "A" it is fastened to a small hook rigidly fixed and at the wide end it is looped over the hook in the propeller. Fig. 4 is a sectional view of this latter shaft which has a hook on each end. The part "c" is the crosspiece at the wide end of the frame; "B" is a glass bead used like a ball bearing to reduce friction; "A" is the propeller. Fig. 5 is a perspective view of the propeller. It is whittled from a block of soft wood one-inch square and six inches long. Accuracy and symmetry are the indispensable points to aim at in shaping it. The large plane is four by twenty inches. Splints cut from a cane or bamboo fish pole form the frame. The five crosspieces or struts must be evenly spaced, as in Fig. 2. Fig. 3 is an end view of the plane and shows the warp or curvature. This is given by placing a bent rib of bamboo over each cross strut after the joints of glue and thread wrapping dipped in glue has had a day to set. "C" in Fig. 3, is the cross strut, of which there are five, and "A" is the bent rib, of which there are also five used in this large plane frame. Over the curve ribs silk, varnished with shellac or regular aero cloth is stretched and held taut by sewing or gluing. The same plane is made in the same manner. It is three by ten inches and has three struts and the same number of bent ribs. To try out the model you will have to adjust the planes many times. Each one is held on the frame by one rubber band, as clearly shown in Fig. 1. To fly the machine, you wind the propeller until the rubber is stretched about as much as it will stand, then hold the whole aloft in a tilted upward position and, with a slight push, release the propeller. Do not be easily disappointed. Continue to make adjustment of the planes backward and forward until a flight of a hundred feet is made, then the planes may be secured with brads and thread wrapping to the chassis. It is a simple amusement device but finicky.

An Improvised Turning Lathe

This article aims to show how to convert an old sewing machine into a lathe. Fig. 1 is a picture of the idea being utilized by a boy to turn a baseball bat. Look at Fig. 4. It shows the fly wheel with the nut "p" removed. Four one eighth inch holes are bored in this nut and tightly fitting, pointed steel pins are driven into them. At the beginning of a job, the end of the rough piece of wood is pressed into those pins so that it will turn when the wheel turns. The other end of the rough stock is supported by the loose fitting point "t" in Fig. 5. This latter may be on a support or may be nailed to the wall of your workshop. We next consider the tool rest shown in Fig. 2. A piece of two by four with a one-inch block under it is clamped to the table top of the machine, indicated by "s." The top of the post is slanted and the four-inch wide rest "r" is tilted, as shown in the side view, Fig. 3. The tool used is a gouge or curved chisel as in Fig. 7. Take off a thin shaving at a time and have a bat on hand for a model. Make the machine firm before beginning work. One boy works the treadle while the other holds the tool. The idea is offered on the assumption that nearly every home has an antiquated and valueless sewing machine and that broken wagon tongues and other discarded pieces of wood are usually obtainable by the country lad. A bat is only one of many things that you can shape out.

Well, this finishes my contribution for this month. All the plans are worthy of your attention and will, if carefully worked out, give you a kind of mental exercise, similar to that involved in the solving of a mathematical problem. If it is really impossible for you tually to build the things described try the armchair method and build them in your mind. This does not mean simply reading the articles, but the imaginary making and putting together of all the parts. It is a mind and nerve test and a valuable one.

Pocket Flashlight

Premium No. 7083

Given For A Club Of Three

THERE are so many occasions when a flashlight is a necessity it would be impossible to name them all but there is one thing sure—it is the handiest and safest means of illuminating ever devised. We offer here one of the best pocket flashlights made. It is known as the "Eveready," which is certainly an appropriate name as it is always ready when you want to use it. But the greatest feature of this flashlight is its safety around inflammable material. In the house it lights up the darkest rooms or clothes closets, dark corners in the basement, in the garret; it may be used around gasoline, or powder, in the stable, in the barn, even in the hay mow, and there is not the slightest danger of fire. It throws a shaft of steady brilliance right in the teeth of wind or rain. The mere pressure of your finger starts and stops the light at your will and it is so small and compact that you can carry it around in your vest pocket where it does not take up any more room than a cigarette box. The "Eveready" is beautifully finished in polished nickel with a hinged bottom which opens to replace the battery and is equipped with a push button as well as a sliding switch for a flash or continuous light. It is equipped with a Tungsten battery and bulb and gives a surprisingly powerful bright light and the battery with average use will last from two to four months. When one battery becomes exhausted you can easily buy another one anywhere as they are on sale in every city and town in the United States. Or, if you prefer, we will furnish you with additional batteries free of cost in return for a few subscriptions to COMFORT. We will send you this flashlight with battery and bulb complete, ready for business as soon as you receive it, upon the terms of the following

CLUB OFFER. For a club of only three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each we will send you one "Eveready" flashlight as described above free by Parcel Post prepaid. (Premium No. 7083.) We can also supply you with extra batteries for the "Eveready" at the rate of one battery free for a club of two one-year subscriptions at 25 cents each. (Premium No. 7092.)

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this Bureau and of all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

Mrs. F. D., Lilacs, Pa.—Vaccination is an undoubted protection to children at school and the law compelling it is intended for the welfare of all. You must obey the law, though it may entail hardship upon your children, not only for their protection, but for the common defense. You cannot expect to live in a community whose laws are for your protection unless you obey those laws, for if you do, then others may and presently there will be anarchy and destruction for all. Certain local laws which prove to be hardships may be repealed by common consent, but the big laws for all must stand though many suffer. COMFORT can be of no service directly. Write your protests to the local newspapers and get them to go after the local evils you complain of.

A. R., Wapinitia, Oregon.—The Government has a right to draft—not "graft," as you have it—men into the army regardless of their religion. If men refuse to fight for the country and maintain its power to protect the churches, what will become of religion? Everything else depends upon the maintenance of the government with its protecting arm about religion, commerce, home, art, science, and all the rest of it, and why should any man say his church forbids his doing his bit for the common good? (2) Jury free citizens vary in different states. Ask your sheriff about Oregon. (3) No particular nation or man was the founder of international law. It was one of those obvious necessities that founded itself. Jeremy Bentham, an English jurist, gave the name, International Law, to the old "Law of Nations," about the middle of the eighteenth century, but the law in some shape had been in existence for hundreds of years.

S. A. H., Cuyahoga Falls, Ohio.—Good schools, in which students may work their way as part of their tuition, are not as numerous as you think. On the other hand there is not a college or university in the land, we believe, in which there are not students working their way through. These, however, do not depend upon the school for work, though it may help through scholarships or by giving employment, but mostly they find some occupation and make as much money out of it as they can. Apparently they prefer this method to being furnished work by the school as they can get more actual money out of it. Make inquiries of teachers in your own town, or in Cleveland, as to schools in Ohio and write to President Frost, Berea, Ky., Berea College being one of the best known of its class in the entire country.

Old Subscriber, Lamberton, Minn.—Maine is not the place for Minnesota to apply for information in detail about the public schools of Idaho. You are going in the wrong direction. Write to the State Superintendent of Education, Boise, Idaho, and get the reports and other literature of his department. Then write to some of the educators mentioned in those reports for personal and direct information. This is a lot more trouble than if you could read a brief answer we might give you, but if you really want to know you will take the trouble to learn.

T. E., Earl, Wis.—A foreign medical diploma, while an evidence of your ability, is of no working value in this country and you will require the same official papers for practise that you would have to have if you did not have the diploma. Talk to a doctor about it and get information direct.

J. P., Donnsville, La.—As we have stated in this column many times, we repeat, that when anyone finds any mineral, or vegetable or animal, unknown to him and to all the people in his community, he should write to one of his state officials, describing it and asking if it is of any public value. If no information can be had in the state, then write to Superintendent, Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D. C. for instructions.

E. E., Creal Springs, Ill.—There is no distinct color of the "rock" in which gold and silver are found, as in some instances both are found in the same vein. Ususually whatever color there is comes from some other mineral in the composition.

W. R. T., Booneville, Miss.—You did not search very carefully through the advertising columns of COMFORT or you would have found several advertisements of coin firms who are just the people you are looking for to tell you about your greenback. Write to them. If they can't tell you, write to the Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C., where the money came from, if it is good.

D. W. P., Tenino, Wash.—Chicory, the kind that is used in adulterating coffee, has roots like the dandelion and a bitter taste. It is sometimes used to take the place of coffee, but it lacks the coffee "punch," as the saying is. It is not stimulating and for that reason it is not bad on the nerves as too much coffee is. Chicory leaves are used for salad either bleached or green; they are harmless and are relished by those who like a mild bitter.

J. M. C., Caney Springs, Tenn.—We haven't space to tell you all we know about the Northwest Territories of Canada, the Yukon, Alaska and other information you should have acquired long ago from the vast amount of matter that has been written about those sections. Write to Governor Strong, Sitka, Alaska, for free literature about that region and to Hon. Lawrence Fortescue, I. S. O., Comm'r, Ottawa, and Hon. George Black, Comm'r, Dawson, Can., for literature about the N. W. Territories and the Yukon country. There is a living in those regions for any man who can get it out of them, but it is not every man who can do it. Which is the same of every other section of the earth, including Caney Springs. One good thing about those North countries is that the lazy man is mighty apt to freeze to death the first winter. (2) The Northern Lights are an auroreal display in the northern heavens, the origin or cause of which is not definitely known. They are especially beautiful in the Polar regions, the cold apparently intensifying them. (3) Some of the northwestern Indians speak English, but the majority do not. Educated Indians do. In the Puget Sound region, United States and Canada, Chinook is spoken, this being an artificial language understood by both whites and Indians.

Mrs. M., Oakwood, Ill.—What the situation now is in reference to homesteads for Civil War soldiers' orphans we cannot say, but definite information may be had by writing to Commissioner of the Land Office, Interior Dep't, Washington, D. C.

B. A. N., Winchester, Ohio.—The customary way to market a song is to send the manuscript, as you have written it, to the publisher and offer to sell it to him as you would offer anything else for sale. He will attend to the copyright and will have it in your name if you want it, but will pay more for the song if he can own the copyright. If you sell your song outright, that ends your connection with it. If you sell it on royalty, the publisher reports sales to you semi-annually and you may get some money out of it and you may not. The great majority do not, because the supply of songs far exceeds the demand. Don't pay any money to have it published unless you are absolutely sure that the song will more than pay all expenses and a fair profit.

L. M., Knoxville, Miss.—To remove ink stains successfully requires an expert in the use of chemicals and even then success usually shows the scar. You had much better get a new pennant, or leave the ink stain there as the souvenir of an occasion.

H. E. F., Talbotton, Ga.—If you and other COMFORT readers wanting information about the cultivation and sale of sunflower seed will write to the Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C. you will receive all that great collector of farm information has on hand and it will be reliable, though perhaps not so rosy as some of you may read of in the newspapers. While you are writing to the Department, suppose you make inquiries about the raising of peanuts. Many Southern farmers are now interested in the goober-pea and it is said to make a very profitable crop.

$1050 In Grand Cash Prizes Besides The Automobile!

The Monthly Grand Prizes ranging from $180 to $2 are awarded and paid each and every month—up to and including April, 1917. They are given to the contestants who send in the most subscriptions during each month. So you see this gives you the opportunity to win one or more Monthly Cash Prizes besides one Grand Prize—either the Auto or a Grand Cash Prize. A Woman's Intuition

"Who could have poisoned him?" asked the maid. "Who wanted him out of the way?" The maid had been well schooled.

"Was there anybody that wanted you out of the way?" softly inquired Isobel of the butler.

"Not that I know of," weakly, "unless—unless——" and Higgins barely caught himself.

The two women chafed his hands, and bathed his brow in ice water. Higgins was really pale now. The mind has a great power over matter. Then there were hurried footsteps on the veranda, and Isobel called out.

"In here, doctor, quick!"

The doctor entered and threw his hat to the floor. He appeared to be deeply concerned when he saw the butler. He took Higgins' pulse, and looked at his tongue.

"Look, Miss Corinth," the doctor said to Isobel. "His eyes are turning green. He's been poisoned."

"Ain't—ain't you going to give me anything?" chattered Higgins.

"It wouldn't do any good," said Doctor Hyde. "Somebody that wanted you out of the way has given you a dose of cyanide of potassium, the most virile of all poisons. All the medical skill in the world cannot help you now, my man. Within five minutes you will be dead. If you have any suspicions concerning——"

"It was Mr. Albert!" groaned Higgins. "He wanted me out of the way because he was afraid I would tell, and he poisoned me!"

"Tell what?" asked Isobel, and she tried hard to keep eagerness and impatience out of her voice.

"About his uncle," chattered Higgins. "My old master——"

Higgins shut his jaws tight.

"Yes," prompted Isobel, "your old master——"

"You must not worry him," and Doctor Hyde winked slyly. "Let him die in peace, poor fellow! See, even his face is turning green. Cyanide is a terrible poison, Miss Corinth."

"Listen, doctor," Higgins said hoarsely. "Before I go—I must tell this: Mr. David Rayne did not kill my old master. My old master's heart is what killed him. He had been having smothering spells for a long time. I found him staggering across the room that evening, shortly before Mr. Rayne came in. He had struck his head against the mantel. 'I'm dying, Higgins,' he said to me; 'send Albert here.' I helped him to a chair, and he bent his head to the table. He was white. I shook him. He was already dead. Then I ran for Mr. Albert. We hurried to the library, and found Mr. David Rayne there. 'Rayne killed him, Higgins, do you understand?' said Mr. Albert to me. And that is all. Now I can die."

Doctor Hyde turned to Isobel. "Please call the police," he said.

"The police!" cried Higgins. "You won't have a dying man arrested!"

"Dying nothing!" laughed the doctor, and with one hand he threatened the butler with a stubnosed automatic pistol. "The only poison you've had was a glass of water—and a guilty conscience!"

In due time the police came, and in due time Albert Hart also was arrested. And, also in due time, Isobel married David Rayne and helped him to build up another fortune.

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In order that each cousin may be answered in this column, no cousin must ask more than three questions in one Month.

MY, my cousins, here it is the first month of spring! But don't get excited about it and take your flannels off, even if some of you live away down South, because the no-flannel weather hasn't come yet and one can't be too careful at this deceptive season. Anyway, the winter months have gone, though the winter weather may linger along for several weeks yet, and we may look forward to the sunshine and the flowers, which is more comforting than thinking about the long cold winter coming, as we have to do in dreary November. However, it isn't good form to talk about the weather when there is anything else to talk about and I see a big pile of letters on my desk that you are more interested in than the weather. So here's to work.

The first is from Cousin Dolly of Pleasant Plains, Iowa, and she wants to know if having taken a course in domestic science and knowing how to cook and keep house, having taken a course in dressmaking and knowing how to make her own clothes, being seventeen years old and able to control her hot temper, she is capable, with God's help, of choosing the man she is to marry. Now, girls, what do you think of that? It sounds as though she should be capable, doesn't it? But let me tell you, that even with God's help, and I believe in religion, she is capable of making a choice that she will never regret. She may do so, as I hope most wives have, but some of the wisest have made mistakes. Housekeeping, dressmaking and all those are concrete things that may be acquired, but getting married is an abstract proposition that can be studied only by trial. Sometimes the man is at fault, sometimes the woman, but whichever it is, they simply cannot agree and though they may live their lives to the end, the real happiness is never theirs. What makes it nobody knows, and as I say, nobody can tell if it is to be theirs or not, except by trying. There is nothing better in this world, if the trial is a success, and nothing worse, if it is not. The risk may be lessened by taking proper precautions with plenty of plain common sense in advance, and trusting to Providence for the rest. P. S. And, my dear, one of these sensible precautions, is not at seventeen to marry a man of twenty-one. Wait until you are four years older. If your unmarried love will not wait that long, your married love won't last a lifetime sure.

Friend, Flint, Mich.—If you cannot keep your mind off of him and his mind seems to be on another girl, you can only wait until he changes his mind, because as long as it is on the other girl, you are not in it at all. I think you might strengthen your mind by study and get something else in it, don't you?

Brown-eyed Girls, Dillsboro, Ind.—The best way to inform the young man you do not like his interference with your choice of friends, he having no claim on you, is to tell him frankly and firmly that it is none of his business and you want him to keep his hands off. You have to talk to some people with a club. As to the other young man, just be friendly nice to him and if he is to come your way he will come and he can't help himself. If you try to bring him around you never will get him.

School-girl, Lexington, Ky.—You are a thousand times better in every way by not being popular with young men, if to be popular you must be, as you say, like the popular girls in your community are. But I can't tell a Kentucky girl how to win the attention of gentlemen. I thought they knew how instinctively. Neither did I ever know before that it was not popular in Lexington for a lady to invite a gentleman to call. It is popular everywhere else among hospitable and friendly people. Suppose you invite this Prince Charming of yours to call and risk being unpopular. If he likes it, you can afford to disregard the likes of everybody else.

Dewdrop, Springdale, Texas.—If you are not to marry for two years, I think you are better off without the engagement ring than with it. Wait till about three months before the wedding date. Besides, if you don't have an engagement ring, you will not have to return it if the engagement should happen to get broken, as they very often do under the strain of a long, long time.

Chick, Wauchula, Fla.—A girl of sixteen and a boy of twenty may care for each other, my dear, and very tenderly, but if they have the strong, sensible love that counts for future married happiness, they will test it out for four or five years and not marry until they are fully matured woman and man. Try it and see for yourself. (2) You don't have to answer a Christmas card with anything but your name, if your mind hasn't anything else to write about.

Mayflower, Monterey, Ky.—A man thirty-five years old is not too old to marry a girl eighteen years old, but a girl eighteen years old is too young to marry a man of any age. Anyway, you shouldn't talk about "marrage," until you know how to spell it.

Troubled, Beobe, Wash.—As he is your only chance for company and there is no objection to him except that he talks too much, I think you had better hold on to him for the present. If you don't like his cigarette smoking, tell him so and ask him not to smoke in your company. He means all right, but needs polishing up a little in his manners. Maybe your parents will not object to him when you have him properly trained.

Lonesome, McAlaster, Okla.—Because the young man acted ungentlemanly is no reason why you should be unladylike to get even. Ask him to apologize or get off your list of friends. (2) Your weight, one hundred and thirty pounds, is just the average for five feet three inches.

Daisy, Lonsdale, Ark.—Your father was quite right in not wishing you to go to Denver with your cousin unless you were chaperoned. If it were a trip to be made in the morning and back at night, nothing could be said against it, but a girl of seventeen cannot go on a long trip with any man who is not of her own family. (2) I think, as you do, that it is nicer for you to know some one to go with you to places at night than to go alone, and you should make it an issue with your grandmother, for whom you do so much, and insist upon your rights. You don't have to have a beau, but you should have young company.

Blondie, Riffe, Wash.—As between a training-school and a young man for a sixteen-year-old girl, no matter how nice the young man is, I vote for the school every time. No sixteen-year-old girl needs a beau and every girl of that age needs very much what she will get in a training-school.

Brown Eyes, Silver Creek, Wash.—At seventeen you can very well wait four years to placate your parents and make them as fond of the young man as you are, then all will be well. Try the four-year treatment, please.

Disappointed, Chinook, Mont.—Having in cold blood deserted your sweetheart of four years, and engaged to him, for a man you scarcely knew, and only cared for because he offered you a home, and now having lost him as you deserved to do, I have no sympathy for you, and have no advice to offer as to how you can get the lost one back, because I don't wish him any bad luck. There, my dear, study that for a little while.

Brownie, Norway, Mich.—Nothing on this earth can be sillier than a silly girl and when you "picked a quarrel" with a young man you esteemed highly and he was worthy, merely for the "fun" other girls told you there was in quarreling that way, you were doing about the silliest thing you could have done. Having some sense himself he very properly resented the false and foolish charges you made against him and I am very, very glad he doesn't call on you any more and barely speaks when you meet him on the street. You owe him an apology and an explanation and I think you can start it best by showing him this little hint I am giving you. P. S. Other silly COMFORT girls, please make a note of this.

Young Girl, Colton, S. Dak.—My dear, when a girl is in love with a young man and doesn't know it, though every thought of him should tell her, I think, she should take stock of herself and reason a little before she marries. Not enough to destroy the better part of young love's romance, but just enough to realize that too much of the romance is lost in marriage when courtship is all romance. There is plenty of romance in marriage, but not of the kind that makes husbands heroes and wives angels. Ameliorate your romance with a little practical sense and you should have a very happy married life with a good husband who does not have to be a hero any more than you have to be an angel every day.

Curly Lox, Rexburg, Idaho.—The best way to become popular is to stop thinking about what other people don't do for you and begin to think of what you are not doing for other people. Then begin to do things for other people and they will think you are the finest ever.

Blue Bell, Knippa, Texas.—It is a risky thing for a girl who knows a young man in her circle whose reputation is not very good, to accept attention from him. If young girls, and women too, would be more strict in that respect young men would be more careful to deserve their approval by sustaining a good reputation. A woman can't touch pitch without becoming smirched if not defiled.

There, my dears, your questions are answered that were for me to answer, except those too silly to answer, and I think maybe I have indulged in a little spring scolding in places, but it was really necessary. Now, run along smiling, all of you and look for the first flowers and the songs of the birds, but keep on your flannels till we meet again. By, by.

COUSIN MARION.

I have two dear little baby girls, one of two years and the other a year old and shall endeavor to raise them to the best of my ability. We mothers have many a rough road to climb and many a thorn to pluck but if we be but patient we shall reach the goal with success stamped on our brows.

Wishing the COMFORT sisters many blessings, I will bid you all good by "BLUE BELL."

KANSAS.

COMFORT SISTERS' CORNER:

May I say something regarding Miss B.'s letter in which she wishes the sisters to make a definite choice between play or kissing parties and nice select dances? Perhaps someone does not want either one. Perhaps her select dances are better than kissing parties. But is a thing right or desirable because it is better than something else? To steal is probably more preferable than murder, is stealing therefore a good thing to do? I may be handsomer than someone else, am I therefore beautiful? There is probably not a wrong in the world that the perpetrator thereof does not justify by saying it is not so bad as something else.

An amusement must be approved or condemned standing by itself. I cannot speak of dancing from my own experience. I know some girls who dance who are as sweet as they can be. I know some boisterous girls who do not dance. But between you and me I do not think the dance made the first sweet or that it would sweeten the others if they tried it. I know all the sweet girls do not dance. Some girls who dance are graceful, some are awkward. Ditto, those who do not dance. I know one young man who danced before he married, but his wife never did. I heard him say to her, "I think dancing is all right in a large family like yours where you could have a dance by yourselves, but I do not think it is right otherwise." I wonder why that was. Perhaps he went to the public dances where the young men did not have to be vouched for. But, I do not doubt but that those girls in your town who cannot entertain at home or who are not in those select parties, will go to the public dance and will say among themselves, "We are doing just the same thing that Miss B. is doing. A dance is a dance, and if it is all right for her to dance in her own home, or in her friend's house we might just as well dance down here."

Kissing parties are too contemptible to speak of. I am sorry for your neighborhood. Even here, in the country, those went out of style before I began going to parties, which is sometime ago.

Why not take a Bible stand, Miss B? You are your sister's keeper whether you admit it or not. Though you may be sure you can dance and receive no harm from it, you know that it is harmful to some, or you have your father's word for it. Can you not start something that is neither a dance nor a kissing party? Perhaps you are the one to keep that deacon's daughter from harm. There are lots of things to amuse and entertain that cannot be harmful unless you have some in your town who consider a laugh sinful. A party of this kind takes more brain-work than a dance or kissing party, but they will pay.

And let me whisper to you that in a party of this kind, you have the best chance in the world to know what your friends are. The one who can dance or kiss the most gracefully, may be the one who is dull in mind or sulky in spirit when the joke goes against him. While the boy who is awkward on the floor or backward at kissing may be your best helper when he has something to employ his mind. He may be the one who can laugh at a joke on himself, or he may be the one to keep the crowd interested and amused, and make the time pass as rapidly as if the time were spent in the other amusements you mention.

When in doubt read 1 Cor. 10: 23,24. MISS L.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around the Home

Holding a fruit jar over a boiling kettle is a good way to open it. The steam softens the rubber and makes it easy to open.

MRS. NELLIE CAPPS, Verona, N. C.

If a small hole comes in a bucket or pan, take a small bit of flour and mix with boiling water and cover the hole. Let dry before using and it will keep it from leaking for quite a while.

MISS RUTH LITTLE, Mallory, S. C.

Lamb chops are improved if dipped in lemon juice just before cooking.

Benzine rubbed freshly on the edges of a carpet is a sure preventive of moths.

When the dish mop is not in use, keep it in a jar of soda water on the sink.

When cooking apples always put a pinch of salt with them; they will then be very tender.

Whipped cream served on top of a freshly made squash pie adds much to its appearance and flavor.

A spoonful of sugar added to the water for basting roast beef will give it a rich brown color as well as a fine flavor.

To keep cheese from moulding or from drying, wrap it in a cloth dampened with vinegar and keep in a covered dish.

For bowel trouble in chickens, add two teaspoons of epsom salts and one teaspoon of copperas to every three gallons of water.

Lemons that have become hard from long standing can be made usable by covering them with boiling water for a few minutes.

Pare potatoes and cover with cold water for an hour before cooking, and they will be less liable to turn dark after they are boiled.

One gets tired of lemon and vanilla flavoring sometimes, and wishes for a novelty. Try mixing them. It will produce an entirely new flavor.

If too much salt has been added to soup, slice a raw potato and boil it in the soup for a few minutes. The potato will absorb much of the salt.

The safest way to keep a sealskin coat or fine fur piece is to place them in tar bags, pillow cases or muslin bags soaked in tar water and dried.

To serve cauliflower whole and unbroken, boil in a cloth, as it may then be lifted out of the saucepan without any detriment to its appearance.

Try mixing mustard with milk instead of water or vinegar. The flavor is said to be good, the paste is smooth, and the mustard will not dry so quickly.

When making coffee, sprinkle a little salt on the coffee before pouring on boiling water, and the flavor will be improved. Always see that the pot is warmed before making coffee.

Left over pieces of brown bread or gingerbread may be made into a palatable dessert by pouring over them a sauce made of maple syrup and a few chopped nuts and dates boiled together.

For removing black beetles, put plenty of salt where the beetles frequent and keep it there for several days. Do not leave any water near. When the beetles eat the salt it will dry up their bodies.

If you spill grease on the floor or carpet, pour cold water on the spot immediately to prevent the grease from penetrating the wood or carpet; remove in the usual manner with gasoline, naphtha or other grease cleaners.

When moulding jelly or any kind of puddings, do not make the mistake of thinking it is best to turn the contents into a cold vessel. If both are of the same temperature it is even better, and the contents will be smoother on the surfaces when removed if heat is applied on the outside of the vessel. Often when the molds are ice cold it causes the mixture to stick to the edges.

Here are some useful weights and measures for the housewife to know:

Ten shelled eggs equal one pound.
Four cups of coffee equal one pound.
Eight eggs with shells one pound.
One cup of corn-meal makes six ounces.
Four cups equal one pound or one quart.
One pint chopped meat equals one pound.
Two solid cups of butter equal one pound.
Three teaspoonfuls equal one tablespoonful.
One cup cleaned currants equals six ounces.
Two cups granulated sugar equal one pound.
One pint of milk or water equals one pound.
Four tablespoonfuls of flour equal one ounce.
Two tablespoonfuls of butter equal one ounce.
One cup of stale bread crumbs equals two ounces.
Two and one half cups powdered sugar equal one pound.
One cup stemmed raisins equals six ounces.

FANNIE V. TIDD, New York, N. Y.

When eggs are scarce, put browned flour or cornstarch in pumpkin pies, instead of just flour. Only half as many eggs may be used.

A Handsome Tray Cloth

20 x 26 Inches

Premium No. 7841

For One Subscription

We call the above one of the handsomest designs in a tray-cloth we have yet seen to say nothing of its large size, which is 20 x 26 inches and yet in spite of its size it does not require an unusual amount of work to finish it. The stitches themselves are simple as it may be worked either in solid or eyelet embroidery with buttonhole edge. It looks the neatest when worked all in white, although one or more colors may be used if desired. This extra large, attractive tray-cloth comes stamped on pure white "Butcher cloth" which in reality is very fine linen finished cotton—a material which has the appearance of pure linen and will if anything give longer service. We will make you a present of this tray-cloth upon the terms of one of the following special offers.

Offer 7841A. For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25c we will send you this handsome tray-cloth free by parcel post prepaid.

Offer 7841B. For your own subscription or renewal or extension of your present subscription for one year at 25c and 10c additional (35c in all) we will send you this tray-cloth free by parcel post prepaid. Premium No. 7841.

Mrs. E. R., Kansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion, that in the absence of a will, the divorce of the parents does not affect the inheritance rights of the children, but that children can be legally disinherited by will; (2) that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, it would not be legal for the widow to continue his business or manage his property, without first being appointed administratrix of his estate.

J. F. S., Minnesota.—We are of the opinion that the laws of your state require fishing licenses from non-residents.

L. L., Georgia.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that in cases where the parents are separated, the custody of the children is in the discretion of the court before which the matter properly comes, taking into consideration as to what would be for the best interests of the child or children.

T. L. M., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that it is the duty of a custodean of a will to file same in the proper court upon the death of the maker of the will; we think that if the custodian of the will you mention refuses to file same, any party in interest can apply to the court for an order to compel him to do so.

Mrs. C. P., Nebraska.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that if the daughter you mention predeceased her father, and if all her children also predeceased her father, her former husband would have no interest in her father's estate, unless some provision was made for him by the will of the father.

C. B. E., Iowa.—We think that all children born within the United States of parents who are subject to the jurisdiction of this country, are citizens of the United States even though their parents are aliens; we think that most residents of this country are subject to the jurisdiction of this country, but that there are some exceptions, such as ambassadors of foreign governments stationed here, and their children even though born here would not become citizens of this country. We think that all national born citizens are entitled to hold any political office in this country.

M. L. A., Virginia.—We think that life insurance, upon the death of the insured, is payable to the beneficiary named in the policy, and if such beneficiary is living, the insurance money would not be liable to the debts of the insured's estate, nor would it form any part of his or her estate; under the laws of South Carolina, we think that the beneficiary of a trust can only dispose of such interest as he may have in such trust, and that his estate would receive only such benefits as are provided in the trust.

M. A. G.—We think that the age below which parental consent is required for the marriage of a male is twenty-one years in nearly all the states of the United States. We think that possibly in the states of Tennessee, Idaho and South Carolina the specified age is somewhat less, and that there may be other exceptions. You should make your inquiry more explicit.

Ruth, Idaho.—Under the laws of Kansas, we are of the opinion, that stepchildren have no intestacy rights in their step-parents' estate. (2) That the share, of a beneficiary under a will who survives the testator but who dies before the distribution of the estate, would be paid into and be administered as such beneficiaries' estate, and if he was a married man, leaving no child or descendant, and leaving no will, would all go to his widow if one survived him.

Lon, Colorado.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving a widow and one child as his only heirs at law and next of kin, his estate, subject to the payment of debts and expenses, would go one half to the widow and one half to his child regardless of the fact that the child was by a former marriage.

Mrs. T. A. H.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion, that it would be possible for the husband and wife you mention to have the deed of the property they propose purchasing, so drawn to themselves as grantees, so that upon the death of either the whole property would become the sole property of the survivor. We think that in case the property is deeded to the husband alone as grantee, upon his death without a will, if there be no issue, the property would go one half to the surviving widow and the other half to his father, mother, brothers or sisters or descendants of brothers or sisters, depending upon who is left. We think that if there are none such the whole property would go to the surviving widow.

C. F. P., N. C.—Under some circumstances, we think it would be possible under the laws of your state, that the heirs of your grandfather might be the heirs of your uncle who died. In order to determine just who his heirs at last would be, it would be necessary to know just who he left surviving and the degrees of relationship and the method in which he acquired the property left by him. (2) We think that in order to protect your rights against a bona fide purchaser, without notice, of the property covered by your mortgage you should have your mortgage recorded. (3) If the judgment you mention is a lien upon the land you have purchased, we think you should have such judgment satisfied and cancelled of record in order to relieve such land from the lien thereof.

Mrs. G. W. E., Mo.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion, that a municipality has a right to grant franchises to public service corporations and also has a legal right to assess adjoining property holders for street improvements, etc., provided, of course, the same is done in compliance with law.

Mrs. T. J., Winfield, Iowa.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion first, that if the property you mention all stood in the name of the father, the children would have no vested right in such property upon the death of the mother; second, that after the death of the mother, the father could sell the real estate without the consent of the children; third, that in case of remarriage of the father upon his death leaving no will and leaving a widow and children, we think the widow would receive one third of the estate, the balance going in equal shares to the children, the descendants of any deceased child taking their parent's share. We think in addition to the one third share, the widow would also receive some further allowance from the personal property. We do not think the children's rights would be affected by the fact that they were children by a former marriage.
